back to Paris for several days, expressing before his departure satisfaction with the accomplishment of the conference and confident that continued progress was in sight. Foreign Minister Grandi of Italy and his wife went sightseeing along the Southern English coast, only Baltico Wakatsuki, head of the Japanese delegation, remaining in London.

Prime Minister MacDonald dined an appreciative group of distinguished Americans through the old Speaker country of Buckinghamshire. The Americans went down to Chequers together just like a little group of genuine American tourists. They passed by the other Chequers—the village public house—and went right on to the big official country residence of the Prime Minister.

HISTORIC PLACES

After luncheon with Mr. MacDonald and his daughter Ishbel they started their tour of such places as Milton's Cottage at Chalfont, Penn's Grave at Jordans and old homes of Burke and Disraeli. Secretary Stimson was deeply impressed, saying later:

"It has been one of the most interesting days of my life. It reminds me once more that we spring from common stock and that we are what might be called blood brothers. There are 56 links which bind us together and it is humanly possible we shall continue to live at peace with one another and strive to establish permanent peace in the world."

Japanese and Negro Children Increase Fast

SACRAMENTO, Feb. 1. (AP)—The number of negro, Japanese and Mexican children between the ages of 5 and 18 years in California is increasing more rapidly than the school population in general, it was declared by Prof. Paul S. Taylor of the University of California department of economics, in a recently published booklet, entitled in the weekly bulletin of the State department of public health.

Summarizing other statistics, Prof. Taylor said:

"The number of negroes in California rose from 11,045 in 1900 to 38,963 in 1930. The number of Japanese rose from 24,181 to 71,952 in the same period. The population of the State advanced from 1,485,053 in 1900 to 5,677,251 in 1930."

RUSSIAN PLANS FAIL TO WORK

Paper Projects Apparently Do Not Work Out

Five-Year Plan Confronted by Serious Trouble

Farm Situation in Chaos as Theorists Labor

entry has been thrust aside to get affairs in the hands of the theorists and the ignorant.

It is this last condition which is causing most of the panic. Russia is an agricultural country. It must not only feed itself but it must grow enough to sell to other countries and get many things it needs and does not produce. Because Lenin recognized these hard facts he kept hands off the peasantry.

Stalin did likewise until the time came when the peasants were becoming so powerful in the state that they were threatening to overturn Communism. Then he and his other Communists set out to bring the peasants to their own system, instituting the co-operatives which were to march side by side with the industrial plan and convert the whole country, within five years, to a co-operative basis.

What has happened? An intensive campaign was instituted to convince the farmers that they should take up the system. The poorer ones hailed the gospel as a new religion. The richer ones—who were not very rich—were repressed. The plan swept through the country-side with a momentum such as that which first swept the Reds into power in the revolution in 1917.

It was a millennium, so the peasant peasants thought. The great government at Moscow was to take over their farms, erect new dwellings, kill the cattle—and everything. Whereupon they sold much of the things they had; and, fearing taxation, slaughtered or killed cattle and hoarse wholesale. And many of them had a grand Jamboree in preparation for the millennium.

BUT TRACTORS FAIL

In the slow processes of bureaucracy it was months before the Moscow dictators woke up to the significance of this movement. When realization did come it was found that the country, which had been almost stripped of animals during the World War and which had slowly built up the numbers, was being stripped again. The co-operatives did not have the horses to work the fields properly.

At first that did not trouble the bureaucratic theorists. They would fix it with tractors. They ordered a lot and sent them to the co-operatives. But none in command was practical enough to see that mechanics were trained to take care of these machines or that spare parts were provided for them.

So we now have the authority of the officials in charge—who in their complaints and alibis are letting out the truth—for the revelation that as the time for spring work is approaching more than 75 per cent of these tractors are out of commission. There is a hustle to get the spare parts and to get mechanics who can put the machines into working order.

And meanwhile the most drastic orders have gone out against the selling or killing of any more farm animals. That has become a crime which warrants exile from the co-operatives or even shooting. And the Moscow papers and dispatches are recording a vast fear that the new crop will not meet the needs of the country. Also the word has gone out to hasten to put the whole nation on the Communist basis and not wait for development of the five-year program. Kulaks are to be crushed mercilessly. The government finds it must get its hands on everything to try to stop the disintegration it has started.

SKILLED LABOR LACKING

Scarcely less tragic is the gestational collapse of the great timber campaign which was inaugurated in the autumn. It was figured out by the theorists that the vast forests of the country could be used to supply needs of the outside world and also the building needs of the five-year plan. The planning was sound but the execution was bureaucratic.

In the middle of December the official Pravda suddenly revealed that the deliveries of timber were far below the estimates of the program: in some cases, it said, they did not equal a quarter of the totals put down on paper. Why?

There were not enough skilled labor and the additional workers were not efficient. Nobody had seen to it that these men had the proper housing, clothing or food—so they were unable to do the tasks allotted or became ill and made liabilities instead of assets. Nobody had seen to it that they had a proper supply of tools. And when tools were rushed to them, these implements were found to be badly made and soon broke and became useless. "Shock battalions" of ardent young Communists were recruited and sent into the forests. They have increased the production to a degree, but it is still far under the requirements—and if any is to be exported in order to make credits it will be at the expense of the construction plans at home.

INDUSTRY SLUMPS

So far as industry is concerned, the best indication of conditions is a recent article by the president of the Industrial Council, M. Kulibabel—one of Stalin's chief lieutenants—headed "Shame." In it he blasted the managements of the chief factories for failure to live up to the program of the five-years' reorganization.

Chief hope lay in the great mills of the Donets coal basin, where it has been planned to make use of the fuel to build up another Pittsburgh or Birmingham (only much bigger and more efficient.) Instead of increasing production these mills have fallen behind. Instead of decreasing expenses the managements have increased them.

The great tractor plant in Petrograd has had even a worse failure. It has been found that skilled workers are scarce; and even high wages for foreigners have failed to bring enough men to keep up the output, much less speed it.

Factories are going up like mushrooms in various centers, but they cannot get workers to do what is necessary on output. None of the bureaucrats thought out these things in advance.

It is like the great grain collection of last autumn. The dictatorship sent out its army of collectors and they got the grain. Then it was discovered that nobody had figured out where to put it—or even had provided sacks for it.

There is one element which runs in favor of the dictatorship. Russia has been so backward in its industry and agriculture that even small progress in the arts of machinery may bring on an improvement of conditions. It may be possible to produce bigger crops even with the crippled tractors; and get out more goods with inefficient workers who have modern facilities. There is belief that next year will be better than this—and so on.

But meanwhile the cities are closely rationed on food and everything else—the peasants lack clothing and other necessities, the wealth of the country is strained. And, worst feature of all, the men and women who have had the spirit and enterprise and practicality to try to make something of themselves—outside politics and even inside—are being hunted down like criminals—exiled, starved, even shot.

Under such conditions it seems more likely that Russia will keep moving on to a great tragedy rather than an economic millennium.

PRINCESS DIVORCES LEEDS HEIR

Decree Fails to Disclose Grounds

(P. & A. photo)

William B. Leeds, Jr.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—An interlocutory decree of divorce was granted in Brooklyn Supreme Court today to the former Princess Xenia, of Russia, from William B. Leeds, Jr., son of the late tin-plate king.

Justice Edith R. Sterne, in signing the decree, announced it was based upon the findings of Percy L. Stoddard, referee in the divorce action, and that he was not aware of the grounds upon which the action was based.

Princess Xenia and Leeds were married in October 3, 1931, in Paris. Both were only 19 years of age and the marriage was opposed by the youth's mother, Princess Anastasia of Greece.

Today's final action was the first public intimation of any trouble between the young Long Island sportsman and his titled wife.

Last summer when he made the trip around the world on the Graf Zeppelin she accompanied him to Lakehurst for the take-off and was there to greet him when he returned.

BERLIN'S POLICE SUPPRESS REDS

Expected Disorders Fail to Become Reality

Prior Arrest of Numerous Radicals Helps

Hamburg Reported Quiet as Riots Come to End

BERLIN, Feb. 1. (AP)—Although further Communist disorders had been expected today, Berlin remained quiet.

The only untoward incident occurred this afternoon in the Hermann Plats of the industrial suburb Neukoelln, when the police quickly dispersed a small group of demonstrators without casualties.

Police believe that the arrest last night of seventy-six Communists put the Communist "general staff" out of action. Patrols, however, were watching certain sections in districts inhabited by workmen.

The said last night was on a headquarters where plans were being made for disturbances today. Those arrested were stripped of their arms, mostly home knuckles and knives.

It was felt that the Communists street coup, if it should come off, would not be in Berlin, but in the Ruhr industrial area, where unemployment is much greater than in the capital.

Hamburg, the scene of riots yesterday and Thursday, reported today that all was quiet there and that work in the harbor was progressing normally. To prevent agitation, the police suppressed two Communist newspapers and banned street gatherings.

A minor incident was the arrest of fifty farmers' sons on a charge of having attempted to prevent the delivery of milk to Berlin. They were going toward Hamburg from Luebeck.

TRUSTS TO BE INVESTIGATED

market disaster will have, we do not know. It will clear up surpluses which require sales of their stock to the public. It may, on the other hand, impel other industries to seek closer co-operation for economy.

"One of the phases of our work that undoubtedly will be increased is in relation to the activities of the trade associations. They are likely to be the subject of extensive inquiry, because of the multiform character of these associations and the great variety of plans under which they operate. Some of them have already been investigated since I took office and have been warned as to certain of their practices, and have desisted. Others will undoubtedly refuse to desist and this will mean an increase in the work this year."

In the last fiscal year thirteen antitrust cases were brought to a final conclusion, five criminal and eight civil. In three of the civil cases disposed of fines aggregating $17,000 were imposed and collected. In addition to those collected fines aggregating $30,000 and jail sentences aggregating thirty-six months were imposed, from which judgment certain defendants have appealed to the Circuit Court of Appeals.

While the Department of Justice is going forward with a program of expanded activities in enforcement of antitrust laws, there continues to be agitation for modification of present restrictions, although without much prospect of success. The American Federation of Labor is most active in asking a relaxation of present antitrust laws which not only affect corporations but his of labor union activities.

Miller Is Paid for a Day's Work...

His employer expects it and Miller wants to give it, but . . .

OF COURSE, Miller wants to give his job every ounce of energy he has. He's honest, conscientious, ambitious.

And he knows that there are lots of men itching and eager to step into his position. He knows that he is under scrutiny, that he is not making good on the promise of early years with the Standard-American Company—and he knows that his Vice-President—the man who sponsored his promotions up from the shop, is doing a lot of worrying on his account.

Miller knows that his lack of punch, his fatigue, his indecision, his "mental fuzziness" will cost him his job—and that funds, clothes and shelters his dear ones. Why should he snap out of it?

Simply because he doesn't know that he is a victim of Glandular Imbalance; simply because he doesn't know that Ductless or Endocrine Glands control the Chemistry of the Body; simply because he doesn't know that correct Gland Function is Health, Energy, Manliness, Strength, Ambition.

The world didn't know it either until Brown-Sequard, Kaznerow, Steinach, Voronoff, Chunem and other investigators of Medicine in Europe and America brought their researches of the study of the Glands—and published their findings.

And then came Dr. Clayton E. Wheeler, an American Scientist, who, concentrating and specializing on this absorbing subject, and, building upon the startling discoveries of these other giants of Biological Research, evolved a new technique of Gland Transplantation, a new method—with amazing results.

Remember—your job is yours only as long as you are efficient—you are efficient only as long as you are in good health—you are in good health only as long as your Glands function in perfect balance. YOUR JOB DEPENDS ON YOUR GLANDS!

Dr. Wheeler, former Clinical Instructor at Stanford University and former Stanford House Surgeon at the Palo Alto Hospital, has applied his Gland Transplantation method over 17,000 times—with results that are proof conclusive to both man and woman.

The treatment is painless, does not mark or scar, does not incapacitate for work, and can be administered to men and women of any age.

The Wheeler Method has been found very effective in the following disorders:

Anemia, Arthritis, Asthma, Bronchitis, Bladder Troubles, Certain Forms of Headaches, Dementia Senilis, Distress Diseases Incidental to Old Age, Hardening of the Arteries, High Blood Pressure, Epilepsy, Eye and Ear Weakness, Impotency, Gastro-Intestinal Disturbances, Inability to Concentrate, Insomnia, Loss of Memory, Malnutrition, Nervousness, Neurasthenia, Paralysis Agitans, Pulmonary Disorders, Rheumatism, Sciatic Pains and many other Chronic Ailments including Devitalization.

Clack shots the subject in which you are interested and mail to Dr. Wheeler for his FREE BOOKLET which tells in simple, easily understood language the fact about Your Glands and Your Health.

And remember—Consultation is Free. Dr. Wheeler is glad to give his time to earnest people who want the Greatest Good That Can Come to them—HEALTH.

ROSE bushes require rather severe pruning once every year and this should be done now—Use a good sharp pair of pruning shears—a blunt cutting edge bruises the branch, often causing trouble—Cut away all weak growth and all dead or injured branches completely, then cut back remaining stems to about ½ of their previous length, leaving two or three good eyes on each shortened stem.

Fragrance

Fragrance is an elusive charm not possessed by many of our most highly prized garden flowers—Too many gardens are sorely lacking in this exquisite attribute of refinement—A little thought in selecting fragrant subjects will correct this fault—

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—An interlocutory decree of divorce was granted in Brooklyn Supreme Court today to the former Princess Xenia, of Russia, from William B. Leeds, Jr., son of the late tin-plate king.

Justice Selah B. Strong, in signing the decree, announced it was based upon the findings of Percy L. Stoddard, referee in the divorce action, and that he was not aware of the grounds upon which the action was based.

Princess Xenia and Leeds were married in October 3, 1921, in Paris. Both were only 19 years of age and the marriage was opposed by the groom's mother, Princess Anastasia of Greece.

Today's final action was the first public intimation of any trouble between the young Long Island sportsman and his titled wife.

Last summer when he made the trip around the world on the Graf Zeppelin she accompanied him to Lakehurst for the take-off and was there to greet him when he returned.

Hamburg Reported Quiet as Riots Cease to End

BERLIN, Feb. 1. (AP)—Although further Communist disorders had been expected today, Berlin remained quiet.

The only untoward incident occurred this afternoon in the Hermann Plats of the industrial suburb, Neukoelln, when the police quickly dispersed a small group of demonstrators without casualties.

Police believe that the arrest last night of seventy-six Communists put the Communist "general staff" out of action. Patrols, however, were watching certain sections in districts inhabited by workmen.

The raid last night was on a headquarters where plans were being made for disturbances today. Those arrested were stripped of their arms, mostly brass knuckles and knives.

It was felt that the Communists' great coup, if it should come off, would not be in Berlin, but in the Ruhr industrial area, where unemployment is much greater than in the capital.

Hamburg, the scene of riots yesterday and Thursday, reported today that all was quiet there and that work in the harbor was proceeding normally. To prevent agitation, the police suppressed two Communist newspapers and banned street gatherings.

A minor incident was the arrest of fifty hunger marchers, mostly of them boys, who had been investigated about 1 a.m. today and have been warned as to certain of their practices and have desisted. Others will undoubtedly refuse to desist and this will mean an increase in the work this year."

In the last fiscal year thirteen suspected cases were brought to a final conclusion, five criminal and eight civil. In three of the civil cases disposed of from aggregating $47,600 were imposed and collected. In addition to these collected fines aggregating $30,000 and jail sentences aggregating forty-six months were imposed, from which judgment certain defendants have appealed to the Circuit Court of Appeals.

While the Department of Justice is going forward with a program of expanded activities in enforcement of antitrust laws, there continues to be agitation for modification of present restrictions, although without much prospect of success. The American Federation of Labor is most active in asking a relaxation of present antitrust laws which not only affect corporations but bit at labor union activities.

market director will have, we do not know. It will clear up mergers which require sales of their stock to the public. It may, on the other hand, impel other industries to seek closer co-operation for economy.

"One of the phases of our work that undoubtedly will be increased is in relation to the activities of the trade associations. They are likely to be the subject of extensive inquiry, because of the sometimes character of those associations and the great variety of plans under which they operate. Some of them have already been investigated about 1 and often and have been warned as to certain of their practices and have desisted. Others will undoubtedly refuse to desist and this will mean an increase in the work this year."

Miller Is Paid for a Day's Work...

His employer expects it and Miller wants to give it, but . . .

OF COURSE, Miller wants to give his job every ounce of energy he has. He's honest, conscientious, ambitious. And he knows that there are lots of men outside eager to step into his position. He knows that he is not secretary, that he is not making good on the promise of forty years with the Standard-American Company—and knows that his Vice-President—the man who sponsored promotions up from the shop, is doing a lot of wondering, too.

Miller knows that his lack of punch, his failure in decision, his "mental flatness" will cost him his job—and that leads, clothes and shelters his dear ones. Why can't he snap out of it?

Simply because he doesn't know that he is a victim of Glandular Imbalance; simply because he doesn't know that Deficient or Endocrine Glands control the Chemistry of the Body; simply because he doesn't know that correct Glandular Function is Health, Energy, Happiness, Greater Efficiency.

The world didn't know it either until Brown-Sequard, Kassmerer, Steinach, Voronoff, Cannon and other leaders of Medicine in Europe and America brought their researches in the study of the Glands—and published their findings.

And then came Dr. Clayton E. Wheeler, an American Scientist, who, concentrating and specializing on this baffling subject, and, building upon the startling discoveries of these other giants of Biological Research, evolved a new technique of Gland Transplantation, a new method—with startling results.

Remember—your job is yours only as long as you are efficient—you are efficient only as long as you are in good health—you are in good health only as long as your Glands function in perfect balance. YOUR JOB DEPENDS ON YOUR GLANDS!

Dr. Wheeler, former Clinical Instructor at Stanford University and former Stanford House Surgeon at the Stanford Hospital, has applied his Gland Transplantation method over 17,000 times—with results that are most remarkable in both men and women.

The treatment is painless, does not make or keep one incapacitate for work, and can be administered to men and women of any age.

The Wheeler Method has been found very effective in the following disorders:

Anemia, Arthritis, Asthma, Bronchitis, Bladder Trouble, Certain Forms of Headaches, Dementia Senilis, Disturbances incidental to Old Age, Hardening of the Arteries, High Blood Pressure, Epilepsy, Eye and Ear Weakness, Impotency, Gastro-Intestinal Disturbances, Inability to Concentrate, Insomnia, Loss of Memory, Malnutrition, Neurasthenia, Neuritis, Paralysis Agitans, Pulmonary Tuberculosis, Rheumatism, Sciatic Pains and many other Chronic Ailments including Devitalization.

Check above the subject in which you are interested and mail to Dr. Wheeler for his FREE BOOKLET which explains in simple, easily understood language the fact about Your Glands and Your Health.

And remember—Consultation is Free. Dr. Wheeler is glad to give his time to earnest people who seek the Truth and Good That Can Come to them—HEALTH.

ROSE bushes require rather severe pruning once every year and this should be done now—like a good sharp pair of pruning shears—a blunt cutting edge bruises the branch, often causing trouble—Cut away all weak growth and all dead or injured branches completely, then cut back remaining stems to about ½ of their previous length, leaving two or three good eyes on each aboriginal stem.

Fragrance is an elusive charm not possessed by many of our most highly prized garden flowers—Too many gardens are sorely lacking in this exquisite attribute of refinement—A little thought in selecting fragrant subjects will correct this fault—

NOT A UNIVERSITY NOR A MONTECITO COLONY; MERELY DEATH VALLEY SCOTTY'S $2,000,000 "ESTATE" IN SHADOW OF THE FUNERAL MOUNTAINS

No photographs have ever been permitted to be made by visitors on the grounds of this extraordinary group of nine Moorish castles now nearing completion in the upper end of Death Valley, so this panorama, copyrighted by Pacific & Atlantic Photos, had to be made from a friendly hill in the distance. The maps show the location and below is Scotty himself with some of his oriental magnificence in the background.

...ACK" NEAR COMPLETION

...h Valley Scotty Builds Him Nine Moorish Castles in Desert for Mere $2,000,000

...he never seems to bring in gold dust or ore. There is a strong probability that he has Aladdin and his Wonderful Lamp tied up there somewhere in the desert and polishes it up on occasion.

In the present instance, he must have strained that bonanbilli instrument to the limit. Even the Moorish princes of old never had a palace that combined of suite baths with pipe organ, musical chimes and private movie theater.

Right in the midst of this extravagance stands Scotty's little old tin-scrap shack.

Unless all signs fail in such cases, he will probably continue to live in the shack while the chimes play "A Little Gray Home in the West" as the light of the dying desert sun percolates over his baronial castles.

DEATH VALLEY SCOTTY'S PICTURESQUE CAREER

Death Valley Scotty, otherwise Walter Scott, attained fame in 1905 when he came out of the wilderness of Death Valley with a great store of gold nuggets which he used in the place of money and sharpened a special train for a trip to the East. The Santa Fe train, with its lone nugget-loading occupant, broke all speed records across the continent. At Chicago and New York Scotty painted things red, dropping his nuggets on many of the shiny bars of both those centers.

He was attired in a huge ten-gallon sombrero, a long black coat and a flaming red necktie. His high-heeled boots and odd manner created something of a sensation in the effete East. He was reported to have spent a fortune and then suddenly disappeared, going back quietly to Death Valley and his source of hidden gold.

Scott never revealed the source of his wealth. Countless persons have spied upon him in an effort to catch him at the source of his treasure. He was injured in 1906 in a fight with eavesdropping bandits. Once he was arrested for ambushing a party of prospectors exiting his mine. He was acquitted.

In his early days Scotty was a cowboy and rider in the Buffalo Bill circus. He was born in Canada.

Some years ago he blossomed out as a fruit rancher, establishing a $300,000 ranch and resort near Bonnie Clair, Nev., which he called "The Hole in the Wall."

As time passed Scotty's contacts with civilization became more frequent. His money apparently had piled up during the interval and he says that all told he must have handled more than $4,000,000. Two years ago he visited Los Angeles with two burro bags containing over $50,000 in gold nuggets. It was then he announced his plan to erect a "castle" in Death Valley. It was to be the finest thing of its kind anywhere.

"I feel like a bricklayer in a dressmaker every time I go into it," he confided to a friend who asked him how he liked it. The Panamint...

WHOLESALE ARRESTS IN DRY RAIDS

Twenty-six, Including Police Chief, Taken in Two Idaho Towns

OROFINO (Idaho) Feb. 1. (AP)—Chief of Police Crumpacker of Orofino and twenty-five other men and women of Orofino and Pierce City, near here, were arrested today on liquor conspiracy charges after a double raiding party, under the direction of United States Judge A. Bruebaker, swooped down upon the two towns.

Details of the charges were not available, but Marshal Brueaker said the raids were a result of several weeks of vigilance by an army of undercover agents who shifted their activities here from the Coeur D'Alene region, where 300 persons were indicted, including city and county officials, and two dozen were sent to prison or fined.

more than ashes for the family of the departed chief.

Government officials in charge of Indian affairs here say the policy of the government is to curtail the barbaric ceremonials and the fire dance is no longer encouraged officially. They believe that within a few years such ceremonials will no longer be practiced by the Navajos.

The present ritual will only end with the apparent recovery of the sick man or upon his death and in the event the old man is called to his fathers the braves will begin their own hegira, firm in the belief that the fires have lighted the spirit of the dead in the Happy Hunting Ground of the Great Beyond.

MEXICAN FUTURE BRIGHT AS INAUGURAL DAY NEARS

Internal Peace and International Accord Reign as Nation Awaits New Leader

MEXICO CITY, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—With the change in government to take place here Wednesday, Mexico will celebrate an internal state of peace that from all surface observations is strongly borne out by a general optimistic belief that a solid and concrete reconstruction program is at last under way. It is recalled, however, that unforeseen reversals have been outstanding in the history of the country.

Not even the irreconcilable, the dissatisfied elements, nor the interventionists, can deny that a glowing sunset is on the horizon of the future. Not only internally but in its relations with the outside world, and those with the United States in particular, Mexico seems on the verge of a new era, an era that has been the hope of optimists since the downfall of Porfirio Diaz in 1911.

The inauguration of Pascual Ortiz Rubio as President will rio in its elaborateness with the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary in 1910 of the initiation of the movement of independence, and with the century landmark that befittingly preceded the consummation of this independence in 1821. At both these anniversaries the nations of the world were represented as they now are for the inauguration that takes place in three days by special ambassadors and ministers accredited to the Mexican government for the express purpose of joining in the general state of rejoicing that is to be the order of the day.

Virtually every country with diplomatic representation in Mexico City has named special ambassadors to participate in the inauguration festivities. In most cases the resident diplomatic agents of the various countries have been designated with letters of credence as special ambassadors or ministers for the occasion. Some of the countries however, have sent special missions, with the Guatemala delegation the largest of these, to make a special journey to Mexico City.

One of the last acts of Provisional President Portes Gil will be the audience he will grant the special

"WATCHFUL WAITING"

The inauguration of Ortiz Rubio also appropriate a brief review of Mexican-American relations dating on the arrival of Mr. Morrow in Mexico City in October, 1927, as American Ambassador. A state of tension existed prior to this date and the governments and people of both countries are now fraternizing with each other in a neighborly manner unequaled in at least the last twenty years of the 100 years of diplomatic relations between the two countries, and probably unsurpassed at any time.

The outlook for the future is in accordance with the existing international situation. And while the prognostications seem to be justified in their optimistic view, capital and some for business interest in the United States, on the brink of stepping into the Mexican investment field, are still observing a "watchful waiting" policy. In the anticipation that some of the promises made of late by Mexico indicative to the investment of capital, some moneyed interests are holding themselves in readiness to seriously consider that field of investment, when these pledges become effective, it being admitted by the representatives of such capital interests that the inclination to "take a fling at Mexico" is becoming more and more alluring. There is also a growing belief that these pledges will soon materialize.

There is still an inclination by some investors to be able to "see the color" before the plunge is taken. A more definite labor policy is awaited. And in the opinion of these familiar with American and other foreign investment sections, the definite conversion of Ortiz Rubio's announced intention to pay cash for all land expropriated in the agrarian question still waiting maturity. All familiar with the internal and economic problems of the nation are agreed that a large percentage of the future prestige and credit of the country hinges about the agrarian policy to be adopted.

THOUSANDS TO ATTEND

The tourist invasion of Mexico seems to have reached its peak with the approach of the inauguration. Large excursions, including many men of prominence from the United States, are coming from various important American centers. The hotel accommodations of Mexico City are inadequate to handle the influx of American visitors eager to participate in the ceremonies that will take place in the great bowl of the National Stadium located in the heart of the residential district, where both Calles and Portes Gil took the oath of office. Formerly these ceremonies were held in the limited space available in the Chamber of Deputies. Because of the inadequate housing space in Mexico City at least six major excursions from the United States canceled their plans to visit Mexico at inauguration time.

The normal seating capacity of the National Stadium is placed at 50,000, not including the number of people that can be accommodated in the large raised platform that stretches the length of an ordinary football field which will seat between 10,000 and 20,000 additional persons.

As was the case with Portes Gil, Ortiz Rubio will take the oath of office on a raised section constructed at one end of this platform under a cloth-covered top decorated with the green, white and red of the national emblem. Directly beside and in front of him special sections have been laid out for prominent members of the government, the officials of the Supreme Court, members of the Diplomatic Corps, Deputies and Senators, State Governors, and other high civil and military officials, with the cabinet members seated immediately behind the retiring and incoming Presidents. Loud speakers will carry the President's voice to all sections of the auditorium.

O-Cedar Auto Polish

It's no work at all—just a clean rag, a few dashes of O-CEDAR, a few rubs—and you'd never recognize your car as that old model.

Costs but $1—At All Dealers and Service Stations

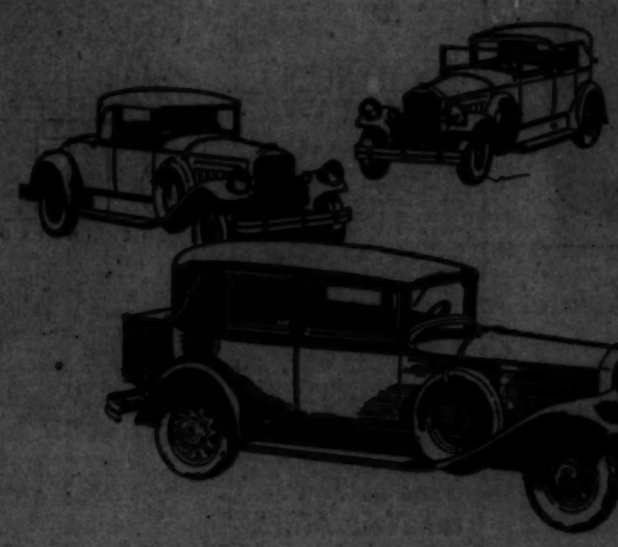
OF 1930 CREATION:

A Distinguished Array of

PIERCE-ARROWS

IN FOUR NEW DIMENSIONS

132 HORSEPOWER AND SILENT GEAR-SHIFT are among recent notable Pierce-Arrow developments. Gears can be shifted quickly, almost silentlessly, at any speed.



Introducing a New Model, slightly smaller and priced as low as $2695

IN extending its Straight Eight line to meet every latest demand of the fine car market, Pierce-Arrow opens the 1930 season with an array of motor cars which again easily qualify as America's finest.

There are four new wheelbases in the 1930 group . . all cars of increased inner spaciousness . . all slender, low-swung, graceful creations in the finest Pierce-Arrow tradition.

The slightly smaller car in the new line . . of an inch less wheelbase . . is of true Pierce-Arrow quality throughout. Its low price ($2695 at Buffalo) gives it extraordinary value.

THE 1930 colorings and upholsterings and appointments are new elements of beauty, freshly expressed.

There are new door latches, velvet of operation . . new clocks and vanity cases in the ultra-modern manner . . new footrests and lights and mirrors which reflect the mode of the hour.

More important, there are engineering developments of vital consideration . . all present in every car of the 1930 line.

MECHANICALLY, as well as modishly, Pierce-Arrow keeps abreast of the hour. Its improvements are never saved for an occasion, never sensationalized . . although it has pioneered some of the greatest.

So it is that today's Straight Eight line by Pierce-Arrow is possessed of every feature worthy of adoption by America's finest motor car. For example:

Silent gear-shifts . . non-shatterable glass . . super-safety brakes . . low-swung gravity centers . . hydraulic shock absorbers, etc., etc. All Pierce-Arrow features . . each having been added as it proved itself . . and without particular mention or especial acclaim.

Nor is there any excess of modesty in this attitude. It is simply that no new feature, or any group of new features, could conceivably be so important as that which is Pierce-Arrow. Greater is that than the sum of all its parts.

(Other Custom-built Models up to $10,000)

In the purchase of a car from income, the average allowance on a good used car usually more than covers the initial Pierce-Arrow payment.

THREE NEW GROUPS OF STRAIGHT EIGHTS

Group A: 132 Horsepower . . 144-inch Wheelbase . . . . . $3975 to $6250
Group B: 125 Horsepower . . 134 and 139-inch Wheelbase . . $3125 to $3825
Group C: 115 Horsepower . . 125-inch Wheelbase . . . . . $2695 to $3875

COLD DAY SETS MARRIAGE MARK

February 1 in London Rivals Romantic June

Thousand See Wedding of Titled Woman

(Copyright, 1930, Chicago Tribune.)

LONDON, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—This cold and drizzly day set a record for marriage that the balmiest June day might envy. The most brilliant of them all was that of Lady Margaret Douglas-Hamilton, second daughter of the Duke of Hamilton, and James Richardson Drummond-Hay. More than a thousand guests saw this ceremony in the historic Salisbury Cathedral, which was invaded by the most exclusive Mayfair group.

Another gilded engagement was announced, that of Lady Doris Hope, eldest daughter of the Duke of Newcastle, who is planning to marry Freddie Childe, a member of a well-known Shropshire family. Lady Hope is the girl who achieved fame a year ago when it was discovered that she was working as a salesgirl in a New York department store at a salary of $25 per week.

Today's matrimonial—news also contained the name of Flight Lieutenant D'Arcy Greig, famous British aviator and a member of the Schneider Cup team, who celebrated his thirtieth birthday anniversary by marrying Lorna Dean.

QUAKER COLLEGE GIRLS' SMOKING PLEA OPPOSED

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—The request by women students of Swarthmore College for a smoking room has resulted in widespread discussion among members of the Society of Friends, which supports the school.

A formal protest against granting the request unanimously adopted by the New York annual meeting of the Friends, has been forwarded to the board of managers. The matter will be taken up by the board at a meeting called for March 14.

The Friends Intelligencer, official weekly of the Hicksite branch of the Society of Friends, says in its current issue that although the yearly meeting went on record as opposed to the proposal, the question was raised whether in a society which always has stressed the equal rights of women it was inconsistent to allow the men to have a smoking room and refuse to provide one for the women.

Five Convicted of Liquor Plot

CHEYENNE (Wyo.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Five men, including William C. Irving, former Wyoming State law-enforcement commissioner, were convicted of charges of conspiracy to violate the Federal prohibition law in United States District Court here today.

The jury deliberated one hour and thirty minutes before reaching a verdict. Found guilty with Irving were Charles Redmon, Kemmerer; Mike Bell, Thermopolis; Olinto Martello, Kemmerer, and Bismarck Albertson, Thermopolis.

Ousted Rector Defies Bishop

DAYTON (Ky.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Rev. Julius A. Velasco, 31 years of age, rector of St. John Episcopal Church here, suspended by Bishop H. P. Almon Abbott from exercising ministerial functions in the Lexington diocese because he was married at Elliott City, Md., last Saturday by a Catholic priest, said today the bishop has no right to ask him to resign.

Mr. Velasco said he will not resign, and will continue to conduct services at his church or will take steps to close the church.

CHICAGO TAX WARRANTS HELD LEGAL

Corporation Counsel Says They May be Used to Pay City Employees' Salaries

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (AP)—Legality of tax-anticipation warrants in lieu of salary checks for city employees was affirmed today by Corporation Counsel Samuel Ettelson, seeking a way out of the municipal financial muddle which has left city employees without pay since the first of the year.

Ettelson said all the Council needs to do to authorize such action would be to pass an ordinance calling for the issuance of tax-anticipation warrants. The City Controller and City Treasurer would have the power to sell these warrants to city employees who desire to take them in lieu of cash for services rendered to the city and would be payable from the corporate fund, Ettelson said.

H. Wallace Caldwell, president of the school board, said enough tax warrants to put Chicago's general financial condition out a sound basis could be sold in twenty-four hours if the bankers of the city, in cooperation with the citizens' rescue committee, would issue a statement declaring the city's credit good.

AIR TRANSPORT WINGS EXPAND

Flying During 1929 Put at 197,546,590 Miles

Mail Volume Doubles With Passengers Tripled

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—American aviation carved a new niche for itself in 1930 air-transport operations by flying 197,546,590 miles.

The Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce announced this figure today in a copyrighted report, and it "established the United States as the leader in world air-transport operations."

Civilian and commercial flying was more than three times as great as military and governmental activities, planes in the former class covering 149,578,451 miles, as compared with 47,967,139 for the latter.

BUSINESS GROWS

Major air transport lines, operating on regular schedules, flew passengers, mail and express more than 40,000 miles every twenty-four hours. Mail volume doubled over 1928 to 7,098,600 pounds, while passenger business tripled with 165,989 persons riding the air lines.

The average passenger rate per mile on established lines was 10.6 cents during the year, a figure since cut to 7.5 cents by radical reductions on most lines.

Estimates based on typical operators and computed to include 600 scheduled service operators in the country, indicated that their planes flew 164,556,360 miles and carried 2,588,580 passengers. Private flying increased from 12,989,600 miles in 1928, to 32,989,890 miles.

While the number of air transport operators in scheduled service dropped from thirty-two to twenty-seven through consolidations, the number of planes in service jumped from 326 to 413.

NIGHT FLYING GAINS

The tremendous increase in mail flying without corresponding extension of airways was attributed to added night flying, one line flying more mileage at night than the total mileage of all scheduled night operations in Europe.

"Scheduled transport lines," the report said, "were flying one-third of their 40,000 miles every twenty-four hours between dusk and dawn on lighted airways, providing night service unparalleled in the world."

Twenty-seven transport lines employed eight men on the ground for every pilot in the air.

The phenomenal expansion of lines was attributed in the report to increased public support, resulting in strong financial set-ups and a transition from corporation effort to group control.

DISPUTED BODY NOW IN ARIZONA

Further Loveland Case Investigation Promised by Yuma County Sheriff

YUMA (Ariz.) Feb. 1. (AP)—A body identified by Sheriff Hunter of Yuma county as that of W. Paul Loveland, Pasadena (Cal.) architect and sportsman, was taken across the international line tonight from Algodones, Mex.

Although the body was identified by Sheriff Hunter last Tuesday, when it was exhumed from a 3-day-old grave at Cuervos, Mex., twenty-four miles south of Algodones, Mrs. Loveland, in Pasadena, has declined to acknowledge it as that of her husband, who disappeared from a Yuma automobile camp shortly after Christmas.

Efforts at further identification are to be made here and Sheriff Hunter said an autopsy will be performed tomorrow in an effort to determine the cause of death.

Mexicans at Cuervos said they found the body in an irrigation canal and buried it when no means of identification could be found. The body had been held at Algodones for several days during negotiations between Yuma county officials and Mexican authorities for its transfer across the line.

Mexico Asked to Aid Refugees

MEXICO CITY, Feb. 1. (AP)—The good offices of President Portes Gil are being sought to save the lives of three Nicaraguan soldiers purportedly sentenced to death on charges of taking up arms against United States Marines.

A group of Honduran residents of Mexico City requested the provisional President to ask the Honduran government not to grant extradition to Carlos Gebuardi, Benicio Garcia, and Juan Esberry, demanded by Nicaragua. It was said the three would be shot upon their arrival in Managua.

The Hondurans declared the three soldiers, after fighting the marines, assisted other insurgents to avoid arrest by finding a haven in Honduras.

Negro Lynched by Georgia Mob

OCILLA (Ga.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Jimmy Irvine, a negro accused of attacking and killing a 16-year-old white girl yesterday, was beaten to death and his body burned about ten miles from here today by a crowd of several hundred persons who had taken him by force from sheriff Tyler of Irwin county. Irvine was captured at Mystic, Ga., after an all-night manhunt by Sheriff Tyler and his deputies.

Bringing the negro to jail here, the sheriff was accosted by a crowd in the center of Ocilla. The crowd overpowered the sheriff, he said, in a struggle in which he was injured slightly. The sheriff said the negro confessed.

QUOTA HEARING WILL CONTINUE

Number of Witnesses Yet to Present Views

Numerous Foes of Mexican Curb Will Appear

Inquiry Body Considered as Possible Solution

By a "Times" Staff Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Hearings before the House Immigration Committee on bills to restrict immigration from Mexico and other countries of the Western Hemisphere will continue through next week, at least, and probably for several weeks longer, according to indications today.

Representative Johnson of Washington, chairman of the committee and author of one of the restriction measures, had insisted that the hearings be closed yesterday, but this was found impossible because of the widespread interest in the legislation and the large number of witnesses demanding they be allowed to testify.

Some of the most important witnesses opposed to the bills are yet to be heard. These include Secretary of Commerce Lamont, Chairman Legge of the Federal Farm Board and Representative Garner of Texas, Democratic floor leader in the House.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

It is probable the committee will continue its policy of hearing high government officials in executive session and, as part of the next meeting Monday is to be closed, it is probable Secretary Lamont will be asked to appear at that time.

Chairman Legge also will be heard some time during next week, as will Representative Garner. It is understood Legge will urge that Congress withhold action on the pending restrictive legislation until an impartial agency has been set up to make a thorough study of the agricultural labor situation in the country, particularly in the Southwest and other sections which would be most affected by curtailment of immigration from Mexico.

Senator McNary of Oregon, chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee, now has pending a resolution providing for the appointment of such a commission by President Hoover, and expects to get favorable action on it within the next few weeks.

FAIR COMPROMISE

Interests opposing the move to cut off Mexican immigration say they will abide by the recommendations resulting from the proposed survey, and believe that this proposition is a fair compromise with advocates of immediate restriction.

It developed today that officials of the State Department, which is fighting the restriction movement on the ground it can accomplish the same purpose without giving diplomatic offense to Mexico and other nations, have already appeared before the committee in executive session.

The department through tightening passport requirements has reduced Mexican immigration by more than 70 per cent in the last year and believes that in view of this showing formal restrictive action by Congress is not only unnecessary, but would be a grave diplomatic blunder on the part of the United States.

REPORT COMPILED ON NATURALIZATION

After a survey conducted by the local naturalization bureau on a request of the Department of Labor, it was found that, of about 110,000 persons naturalized since 1926, only 111 were Mexicans. It was shown by a report yesterday. A number of clerks made the survey, going through 210 books. It is indicated that the survey is wanted by the Labor Department in connection with an immigration bill now pending in Congress.

School Coach Shot at Game

STANTON (Ky.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Ernest Eyrd, 20 years of age, coach of the Stanton High School athletic teams, was shot, probably fatally, by a youth to whom he refused admittance to a high school basketball game here last night.

Belgrade Starr, 18, a high school student and son of J. A. Starr, superintendent of the Stanton Brick Company, was arrested and lodged in jail on a charge of shooting with intent to kill.

Witnesses said Starr tried to gain admittance without paying. The game, which was between Clark County High School and Stanton High School, was called off.

Bankruptcy List Filed by D'Arcy

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—T. Maguin & Co. of Los Angeles, with a claim of $3554, is an unsecured creditor of Roy D'Arcy, film actor, whose schedule in bankruptcy was filed here today in United States District Court. The amount is due for debts contracted by his wife, according to the schedule.

Total liabilities set forth in the schedule amount to $14,397 and there are no assets. D'Arcy is also known as Roy Guisti.

FARM DIRECTOR FOR INDIANS NAMED

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The Bureau of Indian Affairs today announced the appointment of A. O. Mr. Cooley joins the bureau after many years of experience in extension work on Indian reservations, including several years as state director of this work in New Mexico. For the past ten years he has been head of the office of demonstrations on Federal reclamation projects in the Department of Commerce. He is a graduate of the Utah Agricultural College.

Economist Says Thinkers Entitled to Business Bonuses of Money

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—The reason for the fact that we have such remarkable captains of industry, in the opinion of Prof. Edwin R. A. Seligman, economist of Columbia University, is the deification of the most brilliant minds into business.

There is a shortage of sub-soldiers; prizes dangled before them who enter the business world must be made possible for the thinker.

AIR MEDICAL CORPS WILL AID PILOTS

Better Care for Human Element Expected to Cut Plane Accident Total

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—The necessity of looking after the physical and mental welfare of flyers to avoid airplane accidents caused by the human element has resulted in the establishment of a division of aviation medicine in the office of the chief of the Army Air Corps.

The War Department announced today that sixty flight surgeons have finished at the recently established school of aviation medicine at Brooks Field, San Antonio, Tex. These graduates are stationed at army flying fields and in the overseas departments.

Recently published statistics, the department said, have shown that 99 per cent of the accidents in commercial flying, 45 per cent in the Army and 76 per cent in the Navy are due to failure of the pilot and the human element. While there has been a steady decrease in flying casualties, it was reported there had been no decrease in the casualties due to failures of pilots.

Proposed 75-Cent Tariff Loses in Senate

Only Nine Votes Recorded in Its Favor

Present Levy on Calcined Also Retained

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—A proposal to levy a tariff of 75 cents a ton on crude gypsum, used in the manufacture of plaster wall board and fertilizer, gained only nine votes in the Senate today and gypsum was left on the free list where it has been since 1913.

The Senate also eliminated a previously approved increase in duty on calcined and ground gypsum, approving by 47 to 17 a motion by Senator Walsh, Democrat, Massachusetts, to retain the present levy at $1.50 a ton. A Finance Committee amendment raising this to $2 was adopted several months ago.

Senator Copeland, Democrat, New York, endeavored to obtain protection on crude gypsum, first proposing a rate of $3 a ton, then accepting a cut to $2 cents as suggested by Senator Barkley, Democrat, Kentucky.

Africa Alarmed By Undesirables

CAPETOWN (South Africa) Feb. 1. (AP)—South Africa is seriously alarmed by the increasing number of undesirable immigrants coming into the union from Southern and Eastern Europe and the increased number of British-born subjects who are leaving.

Dr. D. F. Malan, Minister of the Interior, has introduced a bill in Parliament restricting the number of immigrants from all countries with the exception of the British Empire. The quota of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and America, is limited to 1000 a year and other countries fifty a year.

O NLY a great fraternal benefit organization, The Independent Order of Foresters, could offer House Protection such as this advertisement describes.

This new plan, approved by the Insurance Department of the State of California, and known as the Four Way Protection Certificate, is the result of the Order's 55 years' experience in guarding the home and in caring for the sick and the orphans. Its provisions are so sweeping, so generous, and the cost is so easily arranged—small payments monthly—that no home need now be unprotected. Your dependents need not suffer sudden financial distress in case you die. No head of a family can now say he is unable to afford Home Protection.

Under this Four Way Protection Certificate Home Protection may be obtained in amounts as low as $200 and as high as $5,000. Any white, male or female, between the ages of 16 and 55, may apply.

WHERE ELSE CAN YOU BE SO AMPLY PROVIDED FOR?

These are the things you get in your Four Way Protection Certificate:

1. Cash for dependents—In the event of your death before 65, the full face value of the certificate will be paid immediately to your dependents in cash, or,
2. Disability—In the event of your total and permanent disability before 65, premiums cease, and the full face value of the certificate will be paid to you in ten equal annual instalments, or, if you die before payment of all these instalments, the balance will be paid immediately to your dependents in cash, or,
3. Old age pension—After you reach the age of 65, premiums cease, and the full face value of the certificate will be paid you in ten equal annual instalments. If you die before payment of all these instalments, the balance will be paid immediately to your dependents in cash, or,
4. No premiums after 65—At the age of 65 you may secure, upon application, a fully paid up certificate for the full face value. In addition you will receive in cash the sum of $200 for each thousand dollars protection carried.
5. Participate in earnings—After being in force five years, your certificate will participate in the surplus earnings of the Order.
6. Withdrawal equity—In the event of your payment of premiums the member's equity will be carried by the Order, for such time as the member's equity will provide.
7. Accident—In the event of your death by accident before 65, your dependents will be paid double the full face value of the certificate immediately.

THESE EASY PAYMENTS SMOOTH OUT YOUR WAY

Like all reliable insurance, or Home Protection, the monthly cost of the Four Way Protection Certificate varies according to your age. Once you are accepted the amount you pay monthly remains exactly the same. Some monthly costs are illustrated:

WHAT A "GOOD LAWYER"!

In the last installment of his autobiography former President Coolidge says that a comparatively unknown man, Stephen S. Taft of Springfield, Mass., "was the best lawyer I ever knew." This is not surprising. Lawyers know that some of the best legal minds in their profession are more or less obscure country lawyers. But Mr. Coolidge relates that Mr. Taft once gave him this "excellent advice":

Young man, when you can settle a case within reason, you settle it. You will not make so large a fee out of some one case in that way, but at the end of the year you will have more money and your clients will be much better satisfied.

"This course," Mr. Coolidge adds, "did not give me much experience in the trial of cases, so I never became very proficient in that art, but it brought me a more satisfactory practice, and a fair income." Which implies he followed the advice.

'Scotty' Blows in Coupla Million

Death Valley Mystery Man Erects Nine Moorish Palaces in Desert

Erstwhile Shack Made Out of Tin Scraps is Being Enlarged Somewhat

BY HARRY CARR

DEATH VALLEY, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—"Death Valley" Scotty is engaging his desert cabin to some extent.

His original abode was a tin-scrap shack in the middle of Grape Vine canyon in the most desolate and lonely part of the valley.

From this, he has branched out to the extent of a quinta consisting of nine great Moorish-Spanish palaces. In various accounts of the past it has been reported that his new shack will cost $2,000,000. It will not. The construction already done would convince the most unbelieving that Scotty's outlay will be much more than $1,000,000. The work is approaching completion.

Scotty has a great baronial gateway that must have cost a fortune in itself. It is flanked by a high crenated tower—evidently for protection against any Turkish army that may come that way.

Adjoining this is a huge building with Spanish tile roofs that is apparently intended for a stable; but looks like a Beverly Hills movie star's palace.

CASTLES IN BUNCHES

Instead, the castles stand in groups and clusters. The whole outfit suggests the palaces of the Alhambra. There are nine in all.

In one of them is a huge organ loft in which is to be installed one of the finest pipe organs in the world . . . this for Scotty, who is said to have a particular thirst for the enjoyment of the harmonics.

Beyond the group of nine palaces and standing against the hard blue of the desert sky is a campanile as big as the famous campanile at Sidney and probably a good deal more expensive. From the towers of this Scotty will be soothed to rest by chimes of sweet-toned bells such as has been soothed to rest many times by the dulcet song of the gopher, burro when sunset fell upon the desert.

In a collection of nine enormous Moorish palaces set in the midst of

RUSSIAN REDS SHOW PANIC AS CAMPAIGN WEAKENS

Moscow Government Faces Task As Theoretical Projects Fail to Work Out in Practice

BY EUGENE J. YOUNG

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Out from Russia, generally kept inarticulate by the Moscow dictatorship, are coming some high-pitched cries. There are pleas for intensification of work in building the new industry and in producing goods, calls for volunteers to do this and do that to help speed the process of making the whole country a vast commune; and, finally, one declaration of war after another against the hated "kulaks"—the so-called rich farmers who dare to be individualistic in a society which has set itself to be completely co-operative.

These utterances are far different from the ones that were coming from the same sources last year—in fact, only a few months ago. Then it was being proclaimed that the country was turning with vast enthusiasm to the projects of the five-year reorganization of industry and farming; and that these projects were going ahead with a speed and efficiency which would soon show the workers of the world that salvation lay in turning against capitalism and setting up their own soviet revolution.

In fact, evidence aplenty shows the masters of Russia have suddenly learned that their vast paper and doctrinaire projects are not working out in practice; that there is grave danger of a cracking-up of the whole campaign unless they can work miracles; and they are proceeding in a way suggesting panic to try to bring about such miracles.

Fact is, the ambitious five-year plan has brought staggering troubles. Here are some of them:

Increase of paper money by almost 100 per cent has knocked down the value of the rouble outside the country and limited purchasing power for materials needed for industrial reorganization.

Efforts made to increase timber supplies for export so as to create credits have failed because of inefficiency in planning and management. Wheat has had to be dumped on a depressed market and sold for much less than had been reckoned.

NATIONALISTS MEET

Building of the new industries has been halted by lack of efficient workers and technicians, bureaucratic blunders and failure to supply enough timber and other necessities.

Production in the factories has not reached the proposed marks, largely for the same reasons; hence a shortage of goods and necessity for more imports.

Finally, the whole farm situation is in chaos because theory has outrun reality; the intelligent peas-

Expect More Violations of Antitrust Laws This Year

Trend Toward Mergers to Prompt Many Inquiries By Government

WASHINGTON (D. C.) Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Expansion of the activities of the Department of Justice in the prosecution of violations of antitrust cases is taking place as an outgrowth of the trend toward new combinations of capital.

Both Atty.-Gen. William D. Mitchell and John Lord O'Brian, assistant to the Attorney General in charge of antitrust cases, are authority for the statement that the coming year will show a marked increase in this phase of the department's work. "It is reasonably apparent the work this year will be more extensive than it has been for many years," said Mr. O'Brian in furnishing information on the subject to the House Appropriations Committee. "It is a matter of common knowledge that the economic tendency has been toward larger units in industry and the number of combinations, mergers and consolidations that have been effected in the present year is undoubtedly larger than any other year in our history.

BOMB PLOT THWARTED

British Museum Blast Target

Contraption Bearing Fuse Discovered as Result of Telephone Call

Anonymous Informant Gives Details That Point to Indian Students

LONDON, Feb. 1. (AP)—A homemade bomb, with a fuse attached, was discovered in the Indian room of the world famous British Museum today.

Warned by an anonymous telephone call that Indian students had been overheard talking about a bomb in the Indian room; the museum officials immediately searched the building and found the explosive contraption wrapped in newspaper only a short distance from the priceless collection of Indian exhibits.

Police, summoned at once, cut away the fuse and carried the bomb to Tottenham Court Road Police Station for examination by experts. Pending the experts' report, officials said tonight they cannot be sure whether an attempt really was made to blow up this part of the museum or whether the museum authorities have been elaborately hoaxed.

Meanwhile, Scotland Yard detectives set to work on the mystery.

The mysterious telephone call was received in the afternoon from a stranger who said he had overheard a conversation between Indian students in which they constantly referred to a bomb and to the Indian room, but he didn't know if a bomb actually had been put there.

The Indian room contains a superb collection of Indian religious sculpture of great beauty and rarity. If the bomb had exploded the loss to both Great Britain and India would have been irreparable. The room is on the upper floor of the great museum building, on the eastern side.

Political feeling against Great Britain has been running high among certain sections of Indian students living in London, many of whom work in various sections of the museum. The struggle for independence in India has assumed a more determined aspect since the leaders of the Congress party decided at Lahore recently to work for complete independence by means of "civil disobedience" instead of for dominion status.

In the absence of definite information, police suspicion bears on groups of extremist Indians in London.

BRITISH SHIPS SCUTTLED

Admiralty Lord Sinks Two

John Bull Learns Cruisers Dropped from Building Program by Navy

Renunciation Additional to Sacrifice of "Paper" Craft Never Authorized

LONDON, Feb. 1. (AP)—The British government has dropped from its naval-building plans two more cruisers than was realized when A. V. Alexander, First Lord of the Admiralty, this week made his announcement to the House of Commons that orders to build the cruisers Northumberland and Surrey had been canceled.

The information became public while the various delegations to the naval disarmament conference were at play over the week-end lull in negotiations and caused something of a minor sensation in naval circles.

PAPER SHIPS SUNK

Besides the two projected 10,000-ton ships mentioned by Mr. Alexander upon which plans were suspended before Prime Minister MacDonald went to Washington last autumn, the British Admiralty today confirmed reports that two other cruisers, one of 10,000 tons and the other something under 7000 tons, had been dropped from the 1930 building program. These are "paper ships" and one of them—the 10,000-tonner—might almost be called a mythical ship, for the British official return of fleets for 1930, giving the complete building program, does not list it.

The British government has made no effort to characterize cancellation of these building plans as a gesture toward disarmament, but the British press today nevertheless pointed to the government action as such.

The fact that two additional cruisers are to be dropped was mentioned in a written reply in Parliament by Mr. Alexander last Wednesday, but his phraseology did not make it clear that two ships besides the Surrey and Northumberland were not to be built.

It was stated that of the original 1929 British naval construction program only one six-inch gun cruiser remains. While some sections of the press accept this situation as a sweeping gesture of good will, other quarters bitterly criticise the Labor government's action as ill-timed, on the ground that it means a loss of bargaining power during the conference.

DELEGATES AT PLAY

Before settling down to next week's negotiating, which may first see the introduction of figures into the naval discussions, the delegates to the conference surrendered unconditionally to the restful influence of the long official English week-end. It will be even longer than the usual London week-end, for the conference will not meet again until Tuesday, when it digs into the intricacies of the French compromise plan between fleet limitation by global tonnage and limitation by various classes of warships. Monday will be devoted to private conversations among the delegations.

The seven American delegates, Henry L. Stimson, Charles Francis Adams, David A. Reed, Joseph D. Robinson, Dwight W. Morrow, Hugh S. Gibson and Charles G. Dawes, and their wives today toured historic Buckinghamshire with the Prime Minister as guide. The American experts and secretariat enjoyed the day at Stanmore, Secretary Stimson's place, which he has turned over to them.

RADICALS PARADE AT EMBASSY

Youthful Reds Display Banners in Washington Denouncing Mexico

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—Carrying banners denouncing the Mexican government, Communists today made a demonstration in front of the Mexican Embassy.

The group, a small one composed mostly of boys and girls of high-school age, paraded peacefully back and forth in front of the Embassy entrance. Banners they carried were inscribed: "Down with the white terror in Mexico," "Join the Red Union," and others were directed against "imperialism" and "capitalism."

They marched under the eye of two patrolmen who informed the demonstrators that they could parade as long as they liked if they created no disturbance.

Meanwhile the Embassy had been closed for the day. Ambassador Telles was absent in Mexico and Campos Ortiz, who was in charge, said he had been informed of the demonstration in advance but saw no reason for keeping the Embassy open past its usual Saturday closing hour.

Clara Phillips's Aide in Spotlight

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive) Jesse C. Carson, whose bid for fame came when he helped Clara Phillips, Los Angeles hammer slayer, escape to Mexico, bobbed into the limelight again today when he filed suit here for $160,000 damages against the Manhattan Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital, charging he had been brutally beaten while a patient there, suffering as a result the loss of one eye and the possible loss of the second. Hospital authorities denied his charges.

Carson, who describes himself as a soldier of fortune, has operated under the nom de plume of Kyle Nebling as a contributor to magazines. He was caught with the hammer slayer after a search which extended through Mexico to Honduras, after she had made a daring escape from the Los Angeles jail.

Son of Whitney Now Bank Clerk

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—The Herald-Tribune tomorrow will say John Hay Whitney, son of the late Payne Whitney and possessor of a fortune estimated in excess of $100,000,000, has been employed during the last three months as a "buzzer boy" in the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., at a salary of less than $30 a week.

Whitney became an employee of the firm at $65 a month last October to learn the banking business from the ground up. A recent promotion with a slight increase of salary has raised him to the position of clerk.

SURF HAMMERS ICE PACK

Roar of Waves Reaches Byrd's Crew as They Wait Helplessly for Ships to Break Through

BY RUSSELL OWEN

(Copyright, 1930, by Los Angeles Times, New York Times Company and St. Louis Post-Dispatch. All rights for publication reserved throughout the world.)

LITTLE AMERICA (Antarctica) Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The weather is gloomy and overcast with a strong cold wind blowing from the south, southwest and hinting of winter. The weather has been variable lately, few hours of sunshine followed by clouds and wind with the shifts around the compass and occasionally kicks up a drift. Yesterday we had the heaviest snowfall in a long time, for, strangely enough, the snowfall here does not amount to much.

This morning the sound of surf beating against the ice cliffs a few miles to the north could be heard even against the wind, and there must be a heavy sea there. Such is needed to break up the bay ice if the ships are to come in, but if they do not we shall be just as well satisfied if it stays. There is no more indication of it going out now than there was a month ago, although it is broken by pressure and cracks on the eastern side.

We cannot help but compare these conditions with what Amundsen had when he came down here. His ship came through the pack in four and five days on its two voyages south and the bay went out the first year on the thirteenth of January and the second time between the nineteenth and thirtieth. Heavy ice must come in cycles and the Byrd expedition apparently is in the middle of a period of back pack. One might almost believe that the Antarctic is beginning a new ice age, except that common sense tells us one can make no generalization on the basis of the experience of two summers.

MANY SEE OBSEQUIES OF BISHOP

Primate Anderson's Rites Simple But Crowds Go to Cathedral in Chicago

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (AP)—Without eulogy, without flowers—in the manner he chose—the Rt. Rev. Charles Palmerston Anderson received the rites accorded the dead.

He was Primate of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States of America and Bishop of Chicago, and, although his expressed desire for simplicity was carried out, throngs filled St. James Cathedral in silent testimony of reverence.

The ceremony was entirely ritualistic. Candles sending a soft flicker of light over the casket provided the only decorative touch.

Scripture was read, the Eucharist was celebrated, and the body was borne from the church to the tempo of Chopin's funeral march. The recessional passed through a lane of visiting bishops and dignitaries.

At Rosehill Cemetery there was a short commital service and the body was placed in a vault to remain until the 24th inst., the date of final interment, which will be in the Anderson chapel of the Western Theological Seminary in Evanston. The chapel, not yet complete, will be dedicated to the bishop.

Italian Quake Produces Lake

ROME, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—A baffling natural phenomenon was produced last night twenty miles from Rome when a lake with a surface covering twenty acres was formed by a faint earthquake at Capena.

This was the exact duplicate of a similar phenomenon in 1895. During the course of years, however, the lake dried up, only to reappear last night.

FIRE DANCERS FIGHT DEATH

Tortured Navajo Braves Whirl and Sway in Rites; Medicine Men Work Magic to Cure Chief

FLAGSTAFF (Ariz.) Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Like living, flaming demons, Navajo Indian braves with their bodies smeared with burning pitch tonight danced their ancient and sacred fire dance in the glare of a blazing log pile to restore health to withered old Dugeye Clitsoll, oldest of the Navajo medicine men, who lies at the point of death in his hogan at Oraibi in Blue Canyon. Billowing puffs of blue smoke sent aloft by the medicine men of the tribe as the rallying sign brought 2000 Indians from their hogans yesterday.

The ceremonial is one of the rarest of the tribe and is only used in the direst extremity to propitiate the Indian gods in behalf of the sick or dying and has been invoked to stay the hand of death from the old medicine man, said to be 102 years of age. The fire dance is a long ritual with many convincing tricks of magic. Within a ring of burning piles of brush a few Indians dance at a time and in the intervals the wrinkled medicine men demonstrate their powers. Last night the braves thrust fiery torches in their own mouths and handled live coals freely while chasing "evil spirits" about.

Tonight one of them made an imitation bug about a foot in diameter climb a pole by tickling it with a feather. Another thrust an arrow, point down, into a basket and then backing away to an ancient Indian drum tapped an eerie dirge and caused the arrow to stand perpendicular and dance above the basket. The demonstration of magic was greeted with howls and grunts from the younger braves who again took up the weaving dance around the piles of fire. Twelve of them entered what was apparently an endurance contest that held only half of them at midnight, the others having thrown themselves exhausted and dripping with perspiration on the ground.

Occasionally the older medicine men can be persuaded to explain to the throngs of visitors from Flagstaff and near-by towns that the dancers gyrating by the fires and the spells cast by the medicine men are expected to drive all of the evil spirits from the wrinkled old chief, who lies deathly ill.

The dances and magic last all through the night but with the first light of morning the squaws who have come with the braves for the ceremony take up their work. The herds of sheep and goats of old Dugeye Clitsoll have been turned into corrals and are being slaughtered for food for the visiting braves. All tomorrow the Indian women will roast sheep and goats and with other food attempt to revive the exhausted warrior dancers.

The fire dance and its attendant ceremonials is an expensive fete, as such things go among Indians, and is rarely invoked for it is regarded as a luxury to which only a chief is entitled and one which only a rich chief can afford. The ritual now being performed for the recovery of old Dugeye man last for days and when it is ended may leave little Foreign Minister Grandi of Italy and his wife went sightseeing along the Southern English coast, only Reijiro Wakatsuki, head of the Japanese delegation, remaining in London.

Prime Minister MacDonald piloted an appreciative group of distinguished Americans through the old Quaker country of Buckinghamshire. The Americans went down to Chequers together just like a little group of genuine American tourists. They passed by the other Chequers—the village public house—and went right on to the big official country residence of the Prime Minister.

HISTORIC PLACES

After luncheon with Mr. MacDonald and his daughter Ishbel they started their tour of such places as Milton's Cottage at Chalfont, Penn's Grave at Jordans and old homes of Burke and Disraeli. Secretary Stimson was deeply impressed, saying later:

"It has been one of the most interesting days of my life. It reminds me once more that we sprang from common stock and that we are what might be called blood brothers. These are the links which should help us to see that so far as is humanly possible we shall continue to live at peace with one another and strive to establish permanent peace in the world."

Japanese and Negro Children Increase Fast

SACRAMENTO, Feb. (AP)—The number of negro, Japanese and Mexican children between the ages of 5 and 15 years in California is increasing more rapidly than the school population in general, it was declared by Prof. Paul S. Taylor of the University of California department of economics, in a recently published booklet, quoted in the weekly bulletin of the State department of public health.

Summarizing other statistics, Prof. Taylor said:

"The number of negroes in California rose from 11,045 in 1900 to 38,763 in 1920. The number of Japanese rose from 10,151 to 71,952 in the same period. The population of the State advanced from 1,485,053 in 1900 to 3,426,861 in 1920."

RUSSIAN PLANS FAIL TO WORK

Paper Projects Apparently Do Not Work Out

Five-Year Plan Confronted by Serious Trouble

antry has been thrust aside to put affairs in the hands of the theorists and the ignorant.

It is this last condition which is causing most of the panic. Russia is an agricultural country. It must not only feed itself but it must grow enough to sell to other countries and get many things it needs and does not produce. Because Lenin recognized these hard facts he kept hands off the peasantry.

Stalin did likewise until the time came when the peasants were becoming so powerful in the state that they were threatening to overturn Communism. Then he and his other Communists set out to bring the peasants to their own system, instituting the co-operatives which were to march side by side with the industrial plan and convert the whole country, within five years, to a co-operative basis.

What has happened? An intensive campaign was instituted to convince the farmers that they should take up the system. The poorer ones hailed the gospel as a new religion. The richer ones—who were not very rich—were repressed. The plan swept through the country-side with a momentum such as that which first swept the Reds into power in the revolution in 1917.

It was a millennium, so the ignorant peasants thought. The great government at Moscow was to take over all their problems, bring in machines, erect new dwellings, till the soil—and everything. Whereupon they sold much of the things they had; and, tragic blunder, bootlegged or killed cattle and horses wholesale. And many of them had a grand jamboree in preparation for the millennium.

BUT TRACTORS FAIL

In the slow processes of bureaucracy it was months before the Moscow dictators woke up to the significance of this movement. When realization did come it was found that the country, which had been almost stripped of animals during the World War and which had slowly built up the numbers, was being stripped again. The co-operatives did not have the horses to work the fields properly.

At first that did not bother the bureaucratic theorists. They would fix it with tractors. They ordered a lot and sent them to the co-operatives. But none in command was practical enough to see that mechanics were trained to take care of these machines or that spare parts were provided for them.

So we now have the authority of the officials in charge—who in their complaints and alibis are letting out the truth— for the revelation that as the time for spring work is approaching more than 75 per cent of these tractors are out of commission. There is a hustle to get the spare parts and to get mechanics who can put the machines into working order.

And meanwhile the most drastic orders have gone out against the selling or killing of any more farm animals. That has become a crime which warrants exile from the co-operatives or even shooting. And the Moscow papers and dispatches are recording a vast fear that the new crop will not meet the needs of the country. Also the word has gone out to hasten to put the whole nation on the Communist basis and not wait for development of the five-year program. Kulaks are to be crushed mercilessly. The government finds it must get its hands on everything to try to stop the disintegration it has started.

Scarcely less tragic is the practical collapse of the great timber campaign which was inaugurated in the autumn. It was figured out by the theorists that the vast forests of the country could be used to supply needs of the outside world and also the building necessities of the five-year plan. The reasoning was sound but the execution was bureaucratic.

In the middle of December the official Pravda suddenly revealed that the deliveries of timber were far below the estimates of the program: In some cases, it said, they did not equal a quarter of the totals put down on paper. Why?

There was not enough skilled labor and the additional workers were not efficient. Nobody had seen to it that these men had the proper housing, clothing or food—so they were unable to do the tasks allotted or became ill and made liabilities instead of assets. Nobody had seen to it that they had a proper supply of tools. And when tools were rushed to them, these implements were found to be badly made by inefficient workmen; and axes and saws broke and became useless.

"Shock battalions" of ardent young Communists were recruited and sent into the forests. They have increased the production to a degree, but it is still far under the requirements—and if any is to be exported in order to make credits it will be at the expense of the construction plans at home.

INDUSTRY SLUMPS

So far as industry is concerned, the best indication of conditions is a recent article by the president of the Industrial Council, M. Kuibishef—one of Stalin's chief lieutenants—headed "Shame." In it he blasted the managements of the chief factories for failure to live up to the program of the five-years' reorganization.

Chief hope lay in the great mills of the Donets coal basin, where it has been planned to make use of the fuel to build up another Pittsburgh or Birmingham (only much bigger and more efficient.) Instead of increasing production these mills have fallen behind. Instead of decreasing expenses, the managements have increased them.

The great tractor plant in Petrograd has had even a worse failure. It has been found that skilled workers are scarce; and even high wages for foreigners have failed to bring enough men to keep up the output, much less speed it.

Factories are going up like mushrooms in various centers, but they cannot get workers to do what is necessary on output. None of the bureaucrats thought out these things in advance.

It is like the great grain collection of last autumn. The dictatorship sent out its array of collectors and they got the grain. Then it was discovered that nobody had figured out where to put it—or even had provided sacks for it.

There is one element which runs in favor of the dictatorship. Russia has been so backward in its industry and agriculture that even small progress in the arts of machinery may bring on an improvement of conditions. It may be possible to produce bigger crops even with the crippled tractors; and get out more goods with inefficient workers who have modern facilities. There is belief that next year will be better than this—and so on.

But meanwhile the cities are closely rationed on food and everything else—the peasants lack clothing and other necessities, the credit of the country is strained. And, worst feature of all, the men and women who have had the brains and enterprise and practicality (to try to make something of themselves—outside politics and even inside—are being hunted down like criminals—exiled, starved, even shot.

Under such conditions it seems more likely that Russia will keep moving on to a great tragedy rather than an economic millennium.

PRINCESS DIVORCES LEEDS HEIR

William B. Leeds, Jr.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—An interlocutory decree of divorce was granted in Brooklyn Supreme Court today to the former Princess Xenia, of Russia, from William B. Leeds, Jr., son of the late tin-plate king.

Justice Selah B. Strong, in signing the decree, announced it was based upon the findings of Percy L. Stoddard, referee in the divorce action, and that he was not aware of the grounds upon which the action was based.

Princess Xenia and Leeds were married in October 8, 1921, in Paris. Both were only 19 years of age and the marriage was opposed by the youth's mother, Princess Anastasia of Greece.

Today's final action was the first public intimation of any trouble between the young Long Island sportsman and his titled wife.

Last summer when he made the trip around the world on the Graf Zeppelin she accompanied him to Lakehurst for the take-off and was there to greet him when he returned.

BERLIN'S POLICE SUPPRESS REDS

Expected Disorders Fail to Become Reality

Prior Arrest of Numerous Radicals Helps

Hamburg Reported Quiet as Riots Come to End

BERLIN, Feb. 1. (AP)—Although further Communist disorders had been expected today, Berlin remained quiet.

The only untoward incident occurred this afternoon in the Hermann Plata of the industrial suburb, Neukoelln, when the police quickly dispersed a small group of demonstrators without casualties.

Police believe that the arrest last night of seventy-six Communists put the Communist "general staff" out of action. Patrols, however, were watching certain sections in districts inhabited by workmen.

The raid last night was on a headquarters where plans were being made for disturbances today. Those arrested were stripped of their arms, mostly brass knuckles and knives.

It was felt that the Communists great coup, if it should come off, would not be in Berlin, but in the Ruhr industrial area, where unemployment is much greater than in the capital.

Hamburg, the scene of riots yesterday and Thursday, reported today that all was quiet there and that work in the harbor was proceeding normally. To prevent agitation, the police suppressed two Communist newspapers and banned street gatherings.

A minor incident was the arrest of fifty hunger marchers, mostly youths, as they were going toward Hamburg from Luebeck.

market disaster will have, we do not know. It will slow up mergers which require sales of their stock to the public. It may, on the other hand, impel other industries to seek closer co-operation for economy.

"One of the phases of our work that undoubtedly will be increased is in relation to the activities of the trade associations. They are likely to be the subject of extensive inquiry, because of the multiform character of these associations and the great variety of plans under which they operate. Some of them have already been investigated since I took office and have been warned as to certain of their practices, and have desisted. Others will undoubtedly refuse to desist and this will mean an increase in the work this year."

In the last fiscal year thirteen antitrust cases were brought to a final conclusion, five criminal and eight civil. In three of the civil cases disposed of fines aggregating $17,000 were imposed and collected. In addition to those collected fines aggregating $20,000 and jail sentences aggregating thirty-six months were imposed, from which judgment certain defendants have appealed to the Circuit Court of Appeals.

While the Department of Justice is going forward with a program of expanded activities in enforcement of antitrust laws, there continues to be agitation for modification of present restrictions, although without much prospect of success. The American Federation of Labor is most active in asking a relaxation of present antitrust laws which not only affect corporations but hit at labor union activities.

Miller Is Paid for a Day's Work...

His employer expects it and Miller wants to give it, but . . .

OF COURSE, Miller wants to give his job every ounce of energy he has. He's honest, conscientious, ambitious.

And he knows that there are lots of men anxious and eager to step into his position. He knows that he is under scrutiny, that he is not making good on the promise of his early years with the Standard-American Company—and he knows that his Vice-President—the man who sponsored his promotions up from the shop, is doing a lot of wondering right now.

Miller knows that his lack of punch, his fatigue, his indecision, his "mental fuzziness" will cost him his job—the job that feeds, clothes and shelters his dear ones. Why doesn't he snap out of it?

Simply because he doesn't know that he is a victim of Glandular Imbalance; simply because he doesn't know that the Ductless or Endocrine Glands control the Chemistry of the Body; simply because he doesn't know that correct Gland Function is Health, Energy, Happiness, Greater Efficiency.

The world didn't know it either, until Brown-Sequard, Kammerer, Steinach, Voronoff, Cannon and other immortals of Medicine in Europe and America brought their inspired genius of the study of the Glands—and published their findings.

And then came Dr. Clayton E. Wheeler, an American Scientist, who, concentrating and specializing on this most baffling subject, and, building upon the startling discoveries of these other giants of Biological Research, evolved a new technique of Gland Transplantation, a new method—with amazing results.

Remember—your job is yours only as long as you are efficient—you are efficient only as long as you are in good health—you are in good health only as long as your glands function in perfect balance. YOUR JOB DEPENDS ON YOUR GLANDS!

Dr. Wheeler, former Clinical Instructor at Stanford University and former Stanford House Surgeon at the San Francisco Hospital, has applied his Gland Transplantation method over 17,000 times—with results that are most remarkable, in both men and women.

The treatment is painless, does not mark or scar, does not incapacitate for work, and can be administered to men and women of any age.

The Wheeler Method has been found very effective in the following disorders:

Anemia, Arthritis, Asthma, Bronchitis, Bladder Trouble, Certain Forms of Headaches, Dementia Senilis, Diabetes, Diseases Incidental to Old Age, Hardening of the Arteries, High Blood Pressure, Epilepsy, Eye and Ear Weakness Due to Senility, Gastro-Intestinal Disturbances, Inability to Concentrate, Insomnia, Loss of Memory, Malnutrition, Nervousness, Neurasthenia, Paralysis Agitans, Pulmonary Disorders, Rheumatism, Sciatic Pains and many other Chronic Ailments including Devitalization.

Check above the subject in which you are interested and mail to Dr. Wheeler for his FREE BOOKLET which tells in simple, easily understood language the fact about Your Glands and Your Health.

And remember—Consultation is Free. Dr Wheeler is glad to give his time to earnest people who seek the Greatest Good That Can Come to them—HEALTH.

The Gardener by Germain

ROSE bushes require rather severe pruning once every year and this should be done now—Use a good sharp pair of pruning shears—a blunt cutting edge bruises the branch, often causing trouble—Cut away all weak growth and all dead or injured branches completely, then cut back remaining stems to about ½ of their previous length, leaving two or three good eyes on each shortened stem.

Fragrance

Fragrance is an elusive charm not possessed by many of our most highly prized garden flowers—Too many gardens are sorely lacking in this exquisite attribute of refinement—A little thought in selecting fragrant subjects will correct this fault—

WHERE DOES HE GET IT?

...Where all the money comes from ...is another mystery of all. Scotty ...is a millionaire playmate—R. M. ...Hanna, president of one of the ...largest insurance companies in the world. His own theory is that he has a secret gold mine out there in the desert — a "gold hole" he calls it.

If he has a mine, it must produce nothing but coined gold; for he never seems to bring in gold dust or ore. There is a strong probability that he has Aladdin and his Wonderful Lamp tied up there somewhere in the desert and polishes it up on occasion.

In the present instance, he must have strained that hobgoblin instrument to the limit. Even the Moorish princes of old never had a palace that consisted of nine castles with pipe organs, musical chimes and private movie theaters.

Right in the midst of this collection stands Scotty's little old tin-scrap shack.

Unless all signs fail in such cases, he will probably continue to live in the shack while the chimes play "A Little Gray Home in the West" as the light of the dying desert sun percolates over his baronial castles.

DEATH VALLEY SCOTTY'S PICTURESQUE CAREER

Death Valley Scotty, otherwise Walter Scott, attained fame in 1905 when he came out of the wilderness of Death Valley with a great store of gold nuggets which he used in the place of money and chartered a special train for a trip to the East.

The Santa Fe train, with its lone nugget-tossing occupant, broke all speed records across the continent. At Chicago and New York Scotty painted things red, dropping his nuggets on many of the shiny bars of both those centers.

He was attired in a huge ten-gallon sombrero, a long black coat and a flaming red necktie. His high-heeled boots and odd manners created something of a sensation in the effete East. He was reported to have spent a fortune and then suddenly disappeared, going back quietly to Death Valley and his source of hidden gold.

Scott never revealed the source of his wealth. Countless persons have spied upon him in an effort to catch him at the source of his treasure. He was injured in 1906 in a fight with eavesdropping banditti. Once he was arrested for ambushing a party of prospectors seeking his mine. He was acquitted.

In his early days Scotty was a cowboy and rider in the Buffalo Bill circus. He was born in Canada.

Some years ago he blossomed out as a fruit rancher, establishing a $300,000 ranch and resort near Bonnie Clair, Nev., which he called "The Hole in the Wall."

As time passed Scotty's contacts with civilization became more frequent. His money apparently had piled up during the interval and he says that all told he must have handled more than $4,000,000. Two years ago he visited Los Angeles with two burro bags containing over $50,000 in gold nuggets. It was then he announced his plan to erect a "castle" in Death Valley. It was to be the finest thing of its kind anywhere.

"I feel like a bricklayer in a dress-suit every time I go into it," he confided to a friend who asked him how he liked it. The Panamints, looking down on the soda and salt deposits on the floor of the valley, certainly saw something new every day as the results of Scotty's activities. He was installing sofas at $5000 each recently and then later a force of twelve wood carvers were imported to fix up the beamed ceilings.

Scotty had an idea for foiling pickpockets. He always carried a huge roll in his pockets, which he had lined with fish hooks. If a dip got his hand into Scotty's pocket it was just too bad.

Then Scotty decided that flying was fun and in 1928 arranged for a big landing field in Death Valley and put in three or four airplanes just for personal use. A. M. Johnson, president of the National Life Insurance Company of New York, a lifelong friend, is interested in his new desert home and has been with him much.

On May 10, 1928, Scotty blew into Los Angeles and stalked into the court of Superior Judge Archibald where a divorce case between Eva Mudge Jorgenson and Hans Henrick Jorgenson was scheduled for trial. The husband had declared in his petition that his wife had kissed Scotty. Eva Mudge was formerly an internationally known actress and recently has been writing the history of Scotty's life. Scotty was in Los Angeles to defend himself that morning but he did not get a chance to testify as the case was dismissed.

Mrs. Jorgenson declared she had known Scotty all her life and that when she was a kid running around in the Buffalo Bill circus Walter Scott, then a cowboy performer, was asked to look after her by her parents. Later Mrs. Mudge was divorced, the grounds being desertion.

MEXICAN FUTURE BRIGHT AS INAUGURAL DAY NEARS

MEXICO CITY, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—With the change in government to take place here Wednesday, Mexico will celebrate an internal state of peace that from all surface observations is strongly borne out by a general optimistic belief that a solid and concrete reconstruction program is at last under way. It is recalled, however, that unforeseen reversals have been outstanding in the history of the country.

Not even the irreconcilable, the dissatisfied elements, nor the interventionists, can deny that a glowing sunset is on the horizon of the future. Not only internally but in its relations with the outside world, and those with the United States in particular, Mexico seems on the verge of a new era, an era that has been the hope of optimists since the downfall of Porfirio Diaz in 1911.

The inauguration of Pascual Ortiz Rubio as President will vie in its elaborateness with the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary in 1910 of the initiation of the movement of independence, and with the century landmark that befittingly recorded the consummation of this independence in 1921. At both these anniversaries the nations of the world were represented as they now are for the inauguration that takes place in three days by special ambassadors and ministers accredited to the Mexican government for the express purpose of joining in the general state of rejoicing that is to be the order of the day.

Virtually every country with diplomatic representation in Mexico City has named special ambassadors to participate in the inauguration festivities. In most cases the residing diplomatic agents of the various countries have been designated with letters of credence as special ambassadors or ministers for the occasion. Some of the countries however, have sent special missions, with the Guatemala delegation the largest of these, to make a special journey to Mexico City.

One of the last acts of Provisional President Portes Gil will be the audience he will grant the special ambassadors to receive their letters of credence. With the United States represented here by Charge d'Affaires Herschel V. Johnson in the absence of Ambassador Dwight W. Morrow, President Hoover has conferred on J. Reuben Clark, Mr. Morrow's unofficial aide in the past two and one-half years of negotiations with Mexico, the post of special ambassador for the inauguration. Mr. Clark, who remained in Mexico following the departure of Morrow for the London naval conference, seemed particularly equipped for the position bestowed on him. As the "logical" successor to Ambassador Morrow, the selection met with even more favor with the Mexican government than would perhaps the choice of some other appointee who would have had to make a special journey for the occasion.

"WATCHFUL WAITING"

The inauguration of Ortiz Rubio makes appropriate a brief review of Mexican-American relations dating from the arrival of Mr. Morrow in Mexico City in October, 1927, as American Ambassador. A state of tension existed prior to this date but the governments and people of both countries are now fraternizing with each other in a neighborly manner unequaled in at least the last twenty years of the 100 years of diplomatic relations between the two countries, and probably unsurpassed at any time.

The outlook for the future is in accordance with the existing international situation. And while the prognosticators seem to be justified in their optimistic view, capital and some big business interest in the United States, on the brink of stepping into the Mexican investment field, are still observing a "watchful waiting" policy. In the anticipation that some of the promises made of late by Mexico inducive to the investment of capital, some moneyed interests are holding themselves in readiness to seriously consider that field of investment when these pledges become effective, it being admitted by the representatives of such capital interests that the inclination to "take a fling at Mexico" is becoming more and more alluring. There is also a growing belief that these pledges will soon materialize.

There is still an inclination by some investors to be able to "see cellar" before the plunge is taken. A more definite labor policy is awaited. And in the opinion of those familiar with American and other foreign investment-seekers, the definite observance of Ortiz Rubio's announced intention to pay cash for all land expropriated is the most important phase of the Mexican question still waiting maturity. All familiar with the internal and economic problems of the nation are agreed that a large percentage of the future prestige and credit of the country hinges about the agrarian policy to be adopted.

THOUSANDS TO ATTEND

The tourist invasion of Mexico seems to have reached its peak with the approach of the inauguration. Large excursions, including many men of prominence from the United States, are coming from various important American centers. The hotel accommodations of Mexico City are inadequate to handle the influx of American visitors eager to participate in the ceremonies that will take place in the great bowl of the National Stadium located in the heart of the residential district, where both Calles and Portes Gil took the oath of office. Formerly these ceremonies were held in the limited space available in the Chamber of Deputies. Because of the inadequate housing space in Mexico City at least six major excursions from the United States canceled their plans to visit Mexico at inauguration time.

The normal seating capacity of the National Stadium is placed at 50,000, not including the number of people that can be accommodated in the large raised platform that stretches the length of an ordinary football field which will seat between 10,000 and 20,000 additional persons.

As was the case with Portes Gil, Ortiz Rubio will take the oath of office on a raised section constructed at one end of this platform under a cloth-covered top decorated with the green, white and red of the national emblem. Directly beside and in front of him special sections have been laid out for prominent members of the government, the officials of the Supreme Court, members of the Diplomatic Corps, Deputies and Senators, State Governors, and other high civil and military officials, with the cabinet members seated immediately behind the retiring and incoming Presidents. Loud speakers will carry the President's voice to all sections of the auditorium.

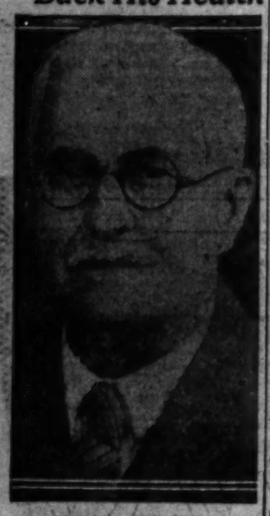
Capitalist Says Sargon Brought Back His Health



JOHN C. SPENCER

"For the past year I have been in wretched health, suffering from rheumatic pains and other troubles on account of an inactive liver principally. I lost weight rapidly and my strength was ebbing away. I was constantly troubled with indigestion and constipation.

"I felt a marked improvement after my first few doses of Sargon. Three bottles put me in wonderful condition. My appetite is splendid now and my digestion is sound. I've gained ten pounds and my strength has returned in proportion. I am going to continue the treatment, of course, for I wouldn't be without Sargon if it cost $25 a bottle. Sargon Soft Mass Pills are also thorough and dependable and pleasant to take"—Jno. C. Spencer, capitalist, 498 63rd Ave., West Allis, Milwaukee.

Sargon's record of marvelous achievement is an open book to all, and only those who have used this famous treatment know its real powers.

Thousand See Wedding of Titled Woman

(Copyright, 1930, Chicago Tribune.)

LONDON, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—This cold and drizzly day set a record for marriage that the balmiest June day might envy. The most brilliant of them all was that of Lady Margaret Douglas-Hamilton, second daughter of the Duke of Hamilton, and James Richardson Drummon-Hay. More than a thousand guests saw this ceremony in the historic Salisbury Cathedral, which was invaded by the most exclusive Mayfair group.

Another titled engagement was announced, that of Lady Doria Hope, eldest daughter of the Duke of Newcastle, who is planning to marry Freddie Childe, a member of a well-known Shropshire family. Lady Hope is the girl who achieved fame a year ago when it was discovered that she was working as a salesgirl in a New York department store at a salary of $25 per week.

Today's matrimonial news also contained the name of Flight Lieutenant D'Arcy Greig, famous British aviator and a member of the Schneider Cup team, who celebrated his thirtieth birthday anniversary by marrying Lorna Dean.

QUAKER COLLEGE GIRLS' SMOKING PLEA OPPOSED

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—The request by women students of Swarthmore College for a smoking room has resulted in widespread discussion among members of the Society of Friends, which supports the school.

A formal protest against granting the request, unanimously adopted by the New York annual meeting of the Friends, has been forwarded to the board of managers. The matter will be taken up by the board at a meeting called for March 14.

The Friends Intelligencer, official weekly of the Hicksite branch of the Society of Friends, says in its current issue that although the yearly meeting went on record as opposed to the proposal, the question was raised whether in a society which always has stressed the equal rights of women it was inconsistent to allow the men to have a smoking room and refuse to provide one for the women.

CHICAGO TAX WARRANTS HELD LEGAL

Corporation Counsel Says They May be Used to Pay City Employees' Salaries

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (AP)—Legality of tax-anticipation warrants in lieu of salary checks for city employees was affirmed today by Corporation Counsel Samuel Ettelson, seeking a way out of the municipal financial muddle which has left city employees without pay since the first of the year.

Ettelson said all the Council needs to do to authorize such action would be to pass an ordinance calling for the issuance of tax-anticipation warrants. The City Controller and City Treasurer would have the power to sell these warrants to city employees who desire to take them in lieu of cash for services rendered to the city and would be payable from the corporate fund, Ettelson said.

H. Wallace Caldwell, president of the school board, said enough tax warrants to put Chicago's general financial condition on a sound basis could be sold in twenty-four hours if the bankers of the city, in cooperation with the citizens' rescue committee, would issue a statement declaring the city's credit good.

AIR TRANSPORT WINGS EXPAND

Flying During 1929 Put at 197,546,590 Miles

Mail Volume Doubles With Passengers Tripled

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—American aviation carved a new niche for itself in 1929 air-transport operations by flying 197,546,590 miles.

The Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce announced this figure today in a copyrighted report, and it "established the United States as the leader in world air-transport operations."

Civilian and commercial flying was more than three times as great as military and governmental activities, planes in the former class covering 149,579,451 miles, as compared with 47,967,139 for the latter.

BUSINESS GROWS

Major air transport lines, operating on regular schedules, flew passengers, mail and express more than 90,000 miles every twenty-four hours. Mail volume doubled over 1928 to 7,096,930 pounds, while passenger business tripled with 165,263 persons riding the air lines.

The average passenger rate per mile on established lines was 10.6 cents during the year, a figure since cut to 7.8 cents by radical reductions on most lines.

Estimates based on typical operators and computed to include 800 aerial service operators in the country, indicated that their planes flew 104,536,560 miles and carried 2,986,530 passengers. Private flying increased from 12,000,000 miles in 1928, to 25,000,000 miles.

While the number of air transport operators in scheduled service dropped from thirty-two to twenty-seven through consolidations, the number of planes in service jumped from 294 to 619.

NIGHT FLYING GAINS

The tremendous increase in mail flying without corresponding extension of airways was attributed to added night flying, one line flying more mileage at night than the total mileage of all scheduled night operations in Europe.

"Scheduled transport lines," the report said, "were flying one-third of their 90,000 miles every twenty-four hours between dusk and dawn on lighted airways, providing night service unparalleled in the world."

Twenty-seven transport lines employed eight men on the ground for every pilot in the air.

The phenomenal expansion of lines was attributed in the report to increased public support, resulting in strong financial set-ups and a transition from corporation effort to group control.

YUMA (Ariz.) Feb. 1. (AP)—A body identified by Sheriff Hunter of Yuma county as that of W. Paul Loveland, Pasadena (Cal.) architect and sportsman, was taken across the international line tonight from Algodones, Mex.

Although the body was identified by Sheriff Hunter last Tuesday, when it was exhumed from a 3-day-old grave at Cuervos, Mex., twenty-four miles south of Algodones, Mrs. Loveland, in Pasadena, has declined to acknowledge it as that of her husband, who disappeared from a Yuma automobile camp shortly after Christmas.

Efforts at further identification are to be made here and Sheriff Hunter said an autopsy will be performed tomorrow in an effort to determine the cause of death.

Mexicans at Cuervos said they found the body in an irrigation canal and buried it when no means of identification were apparent. It has been held at Algodones for several days during negotiations between Yuma county officials and Mexican authorities for its transfer across the line.

Mexico Asked to Aid Refugees

MEXICO CITY, Feb. 1. (AP)—The good offices of President Portes Gil are being sought to save the lives of three Nicaraguan soldiers purportedly sentenced to death on charges of taking up arms against United States Marines.

A group of Honduran residents of Mexico City requested the provisional President to ask the Honduran government not to grant extradition to Carlos Gabuardi, Benicio Garcia, and Juan Echerry, demanded by Nicaragua. It was said the three would be shot upon their arrival in Managua.

The Hondurans declared the three soldiers, after fighting the marines, assisted other insurgents to avoid arrest by finding a haven in Honduras.

Negro Lynched by Georgia Mob

OCILLA (Ga.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Jimmy Irvine, a negro accused of attacking and killing a 14-year-old white girl yesterday, was beaten to death and his body burned about ten miles from here today by a crowd of several hundred persons who had taken him by force from Sheriff Tyler of Irwin county. Irvine was captured at Mystic, Ga., after an all-night manhunt by Sheriff Tyler and his deputies.

Bringing the negro to jail here, the Sheriff was accosted by a crowd in the center of Ocilla. The crowd overpowered the Sheriff, he said, in a struggle in which he was injured slightly. The Sheriff said the negro confessed.

QUOTA HEARING WILL CONTINUE

Number of Witnesses Yet to Present Views

Numerous Foes of Mexican Curb Will Appear

Inquiry Body Considered as Possible Solution

By a "Times" Staff Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Hearings before the House Immigration Committee on bills to restrict immigration from Mexico and other countries of the Western Hemisphere will continue through next week, at least, and probably for several weeks longer, according to indications today.

Representative Johnson of Washington, chairman of the committee and author of one of the restriction measures, had insisted that the hearings be closed yesterday, but this was found impossible because of the widespread interest in the legislation and the large number of witnesses demanding they be allowed to testify.

Some of the most important witnesses opposed to the bills are yet to be heard. These include Secretary of Commerce Lamont, Chairman Legge of the Federal Farm Board and Representative Garner of Texas, Democratic floor leader in the House.

It is probable the committee will continue its policy of hearing high government officials in executive session and, as part of the next meeting Monday is to be closed, it is probable Secretary Lamont will be asked to appear at that time.

Chairman Legge also will be heard some time during next week, as will Representative Garner. It is understood Legge will urge that Congress withhold action on the pending restrictive legislation until an impartial agency has been set up to make a thorough study of the agricultural labor situation in the country, particularly in the Southwest and other sections which would be most affected by curtailment of immigration from Mexico.

Senator McNary of Oregon, chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee, now has pending a resolution providing for the appointment of such a commission by President Hoover, and expects to get favorable action on it within the next few weeks.

FAIR COMPROMISE

Interests opposing the move to cut off Mexican immigration say they will abide by the recommendations resulting from the proposed survey, and believe that this proposition is a fair compromise with advocates of immediate restriction.

It developed today that officials of the State Department, which is fighting the restriction movement on the ground it can accomplish the same purpose without giving diplomatic offense to Mexico and other nations, have already appeared before the committee in executive session.

The department through tightening passport requirements has reduced Mexican immigration by more than 70 per cent in the last year and believes that in view of this showing formal restrictive action by Congress is not only unnecessary, but would be a grave diplomatic blunder on the part of the United States.

REPORT COMPILED ON NATURALIZATION

After a survey conducted by the local naturalization bureau on a request of the Department of Labor, it was found that of about 110,000 persons naturalized since 1906, only 111 were Mexicans, it was shown by a report yesterday. A number of clerks made the survey, going through 210 books. It is indicated that the survey is wanted by the Labor Department in connection with an immigration bill now pending in Congress.

School Coach Shot at Game

STANTON (Ky.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Ernest Byrd, 26 years of age, coach of the Stanton High School athletic teams, was shot, probably fatally, by a youth to whom he refused admittance to a high school basketball game here last night.

Belgrade Harr, 16, a high school student and son of J. A. Harr, superintendent of the Stanton Brick Company, was arrested and lodged in jail on a charge of shooting with intent to kill.

Witnesses said Harr tried to gain admittance without paying. The game, which was between Clark County High School and Stanton High School, was called off.

There is a shortage of scientists; prizes dangled before those who enter the business world must be made possible for the thinker.

AIR MEDICAL CORPS WILL AID PILOTS

Better Care for Human Element Expected to Cut Plane Accident Total

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—The necessity of looking after the physical and mental welfare of flyers to avoid airplane accidents caused by the human element has resulted in the establishment of a division of aviation medicine in the office of the chief of the Army Air Corps.

The War Department announced today that sixty flight surgeons have finished at the recently established school of aviation medicine at Brooks Field, San Antonio, Tex. These graduates are stationed at army flying fields and in the overseas department.

Recently published statistics, the department said, have shown that 59 per cent of the accidents in commercial flying, 63 per cent in the Army and 74 per cent in the Navy are due to failure of the pilot and the human element. While there has been a steady decrease in flying casualties, it was reported there had been no decrease in the casualties due to failures of pilots.

Proposed 75-Cent Tariff Loses in Senate

Only Nine Votes Recorded in Its Favor

Present Levy on Calcined Also Retained

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—A proposal to levy a tariff of 75 cents a ton on crude gypsum, used in the manufacture of plaster wall board and fertilizer, gained only nine votes in the Senate today and gypsum was left on the free list where it has been since 1922.

The Senate also eliminated a previously approved increase in duty on calcined and ground gypsum, approving by 47 to 17 a motion by Senator Walsh, Democrat, Massachusetts, to retain the present levy at $1.40 a ton. A Finance Committee amendment raising this to $3 was adopted several months ago.

Senator Copeland, Democrat, New York, endeavored to obtain protection on crude gypsum, first proposing a rate of $3 a ton, then accepting a cut to 75 cents as suggested by Senator Barkley, Democrat, Kentucky.

Africa Alarmed By Undesirables

CAPETOWN (South Africa) Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—South Africa is seriously alarmed by the increasing number of undesirable immigrants coming into the union from Southern and Eastern Europe and the increased number of British-born subjects who are leaving.

Dr. D. F. Malan, Minister of the Interior, has introduced a bill in Parliament restricting the number of immigrants from all countries with the exception of the British Empire. The quota of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and America is limited to 1000 a year and other countries fifty a year.

CARE FOR THE SICK AND THE ORPHANS

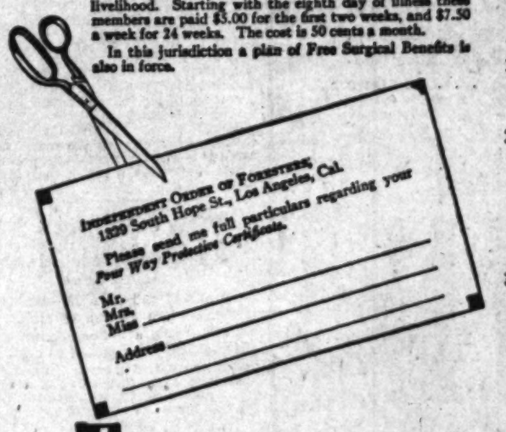
THE Independent Order of Foresters maintains and operates two Tuberculosis Sanatoria—one in Lopez Canyon, near Los Angeles, California, and the other in the Adirondack Mountains, near Saranac Lake. Hundreds of sufferers, members of the Order, have been successfully treated without a cent of cost to them.

A large and well-equipped Orphans' Home is maintained at Oakville, near Toronto, Ontario. Here full orphans of deceased members are educated and trained for the battle of life.

Among other membership privileges the Order issues Maximum and Minimum Sick Benefit Certificates to male members, costing 50 cents a month. Starting with the eighth day of illness, members are paid $5.00 a week for two weeks, and then $10.00 a week for the following twenty-four weeks.

Another Maximum and Minimum Sick Benefit Certificate is issued to unmarried girls earning their own livelihood. Starting with the eighth day of illness these members are paid $5.00 for the first two weeks, and $7.50 a week for 24 weeks. The cost is 50 cents a month.

In this jurisdiction a plan of Free Surgical Benefits is also in force.



ONLY a great fraternal benefit organization, The Independent Order of Foresters, could offer Home Protection such as this advertisement describes.

This new plan, appropriately called the Four Way Protective Certificate, is the result of the Order's 55 years' experience in guarding the home and in caring for the sick and the orphans. Its provisions are so sweeping, so generous, and the cost is so easily arranged—small payments monthly—that no home need now be unprotected. Your dependents need not suffer sudden financial distress in case you die. No head of a family can now say he is unable to afford Home Protection.

Under this Four Way Protective Certificate Home Protection may be obtained in amounts as low as $200 and as high as $5,000. Any white, male or female, between the ages of 16 and 55, may apply.

WHERE ELSE CAN YOU BE SO AMPLY PROVIDED FOR?

These are the things you get in your Four Way Protective Certificate:

1. Cash for dependents—In the event of your death before 65, the full face value of the certificate will be paid immediately to your dependents in cash, or,
2. Disability—In the event of your total and permanent disability before 65, premiums cease, and the full face value of the certificate will be paid to you in ten equal annual instalments, or, if you die before payment of all these instalments, the balance will be paid immediately to your dependents in cash, or,
3. Old age pension—After you reach the age of 65, premiums cease, and the full face value of the certificate will be paid you in ten equal annual instalments. If you die before payment of all these instalments, the balance will be paid immediately to your dependents in cash, or,
4. No premiums after 65—At the age of 65 you may secure, upon application, a full paid up certificate for the full face value. In addition you will receive in cash the sum of $200 for each thousand dollars protection carried.
5. Participate in earnings—After being in force five years, your certificate will participate in the surplus earnings of the Order.
6. Withdrawal equity—In the event of non-payment of premiums the member's insurance will be carried by the Order, for such period as the member's equity will provide.
7. Accident—In the event of your death by accident before 65, your dependents will be paid double the full face value of the certificate immediately.

THESE EASY PAYMENTS SMOOTH OUT YOUR WAY

Like all reliable insurance, or Home Protection, the monthly cost of the Four Way Protective Certificate varies according to your present age. Once you are accepted the amount you pay monthly remains exactly the same. Some monthly costs are illustrated:

Face value of Certificate	Cost per month at: 16 years	21 years	25 years	35 years
$200	$ .34	$ .37	$ .40	$ ....
$500	.76	.83	.91	1....
$1000	1.41	1.55	1.72	2....

Nowhere else can you shield your dependents to such an extent with payments so easily arranged. You will hardly miss the small amounts paid monthly—amounts you perhaps carelessly spend in a passing luxury or amusement. The Four Way Protective Certificate enables everyone to perform his first duty—protect the home. The opportunity is now yours.

Join the Independent Order of Foresters. In addition to Home Protection, share the privileges, benefits and fellowship with 145,000 members. Court dues, also payable monthly, are at a minimum. The fact that membership entitles you to free medical attendance is also worth many times the cost of court dues. 'Phone or write the officers listed here, or fill in and mail the coupon.

MAKING TOPING CRIME FAVORED

Fat Member of House Asks War on Drinkers

Bootleggers Declared to be Merely Abettors

Senator Jones Predicts New Teeth in Dry Law

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—A demand that the drinker of alcoholic beverages be classed as a criminal and that prohibition enforcement agencies be directed against such persons was made in the House today by Representative Lehlbach, Republican, New Jersey, who is a member of the wet group in Congress.

He said it is those who drink that are "essentially the ones who disregard and defy" the dry law; that the still operator, the rum-runner, and the bootlegger are "merely abettors of the violator" and the drinker is the real breaker and the criminal.

Lehlbach, a warm friend of Representative Fort, Republican, New Jersey, a dry, who yesterday declared in the House that drinking of home brew is not unlawful under the dry laws, took issue with his colleague.

WHAT HE SAYS

He said:

"It is idle to reiterate that the act of drinking is not forbidden. On 99 and 99-100th per cent of such occasions the very presence of the beverage necessarily entailed the commission of one or more acts made felonies by the Jones Act, and its possession at the time of its use is declared a crime."

Frequently it has been advocated that the buyer of liquor be made equally guilty with the seller, but as far as can be recalled at the Capitol, Lehlbach is the first to advocate that whoever drinks it should be classed as a criminal. He asserted as he understands it, the intent and purpose of the prohibition laws is to stop the drinking of alcoholic beverages, adding:

"The persons who drink them are essentially the ones who disregard and defy the legislation on this subject. It is absurd to suggest that they make their own clothing and raise they own food at home. Those who make, sell and transport liquor are merely agents who enable the real violators of prohibition to do so."

Lehlbach said that there are millions of violators of the law in every station of life, and that the still operators, rum-runners, bootleggers and their ilk, are merely the abettors of the violators.

PREDICTIONS MADE

The prediction was made tonight by Senator Jones of Washington, that any Congressional vote which results will strengthen rather than modify the Volstead Act.

In the Senate, Maj.-Gen. Smedley Butler of the Marine Corps, was suggested by Senator Brookhart, Republican, Iowa, to be appointed prohibition commissioner. A new commissioner would be named under the bill finally approved today by the House Expenditures Committee to effect the transfer of the dry unit from the Treasury to the Justice Department. Brookhart insisted the vigorous marine officer effectively would enforce the dry law against all alike.

At a special meeting, the House Expenditures Committee today reinstated a provision in the transfer bill to authorize the Attorney-General and the Secretary of the Treasury, jointly, to draw up regulations governing industrial alcohol withdrawal permits. However, the amendment gives the Attorney-General sole authority to administer the Prohibition Bureau.

SHOES DECREED BY PORTUGAL

Governmental Order Says Sight of Unshod Feet Unesthetic

LISBON, Feb. 1. (AP)—"Everybody must wear shoes," says a government decree, "because the sight of an unshod foot and leg is repulsive to many foreigners, is unhealthy and unesthetic. It furthermore suggests backwardness for the country."

The barefoot custom is so strong, especially among peasants, that enforcement is difficult.

RULING ON PAROLES RENDERED

Court Says Prison Board Must Act Upon All Cases; Delays Held Illegal

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Superior Judge Butler today ruled the State Prison Board must act upon parole applications, either by granting or denying, but exceeds its legal jurisdiction by postponing cases, as it has been in the habit of doing for years.

Judge Butler's ruling was on a petition brought by Raymond Clawson, sentenced from one to twenty years from Oakland, who demanded a parole hearing because he has served his minimum sentence. He was granted a writ of mandamus.

If sustained, the ruling will be applicable to some 3000 prisoners in San Quentin and Folsom, according to the Parole Board, but it will by no means result in a wholesale freeing of prisoners on parole. In the first place the decision will be appealed, it is predicted. If the higher courts sustain it, it is said the prison board can continue the present methods of considering paroles merely by denying the applications until such time as the board is ready to act upon them. The practice is to have the prisoner serve half his or her sentence, minus good behavior time, before parole applications are acted upon.

PRIMO'S ORDERS MAY BE ERASED

Dictator's Decrees Held Not Constitutional

Berenguer Begins Study of Appointments

Old Regime Officials Still Retain Places

MADRID, Feb. 1. (AP)—The new Spanish government under Gen. Damaso Berenguer has found itself in a position to get rid of things done by Gen. Primo de Rivera by an easy method, if it does not approve of them.

It is expected here that the new regime will erase many of Primo's acts in the six-year dictatorship. None of them was technically put into effect under a constitution because Primo had suspended the constitution. Hence the Berenguer government finds itself at liberty to rescind any orders of the dictatorship for the reason that they are not in accordance with the constitution.

The program of the new government for "re-establishment of normalcy and constitutionalism," as Gen. Berenguer describes it, included consideration of many political appointments made by Primo.

These officials, such as mayors, provincial governors, district officials and so on, are continuing in their posts while the administration studies their status, although the usual procedure under a change of government is to resign.

Meanwhile, Gen. Berenguer seemed jovial as he went to his new job with zest, but he admitted that if it continued to keep him as busy as in the first few days he will not enjoy it so much.

SONG'S ORIGIN HELD "LOW"

But Notes of "Star Spangled Banner" Declared by Children's Music Composer to be Too High

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—A House subcommittee, which yesterday heard two clear-voiced sopranos sing "The Star Spangled Banner" without faltering on a single high note, today listened as the proposed national anthem was described as "war-like and unsingable."

The air that snaps the average American to attention was rendered yesterday with a rearrangement to give the average voice a better chance on some of the high passages, but Miss Kitty Cheatham of New York, composer of children's music, contended that no revision would make "The Star Spangled Banner" singable.

She opposed its music as "a drinking song—a bacchanale," and objected especially to the phrases, "rocket's red glare," "bombs bursting in air" and "foul footsteps pollution" as not suitable to teach children.

She quoted the finale of each stanza of the song as originally written, "entwine the mrytle of Venus with Bacchus vine," to show that it was of "barroom origin."

Chairman Dyer, Republican, Missouri, set Tuesday for final action on the bill proposed by Representative Linthicum, Democrat, Maryland, to make "The Star Spangled Banner" the national anthem, commenting that his committee is as well versed on the subject now as they will ever be.

GREEK REDS PUNISHED FOR LEGATION ATTACK

ATHENS (Greece) Feb. 1. (AP)—Communists who Thursday attacked the Jugo-Slavian Legation here were sentenced yesterday to six months' imprisonment and three months banishment. Public opinion has become considerably aroused over insults to King Alexander, who is popular in Greece.

HAITIAN INQUIRY FUND APPROVED

Senate, However, Balks on Authorizing Commission

President Declared Already Empowered to Proceed

Resolution Now Slated for Return to Lower House

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—Refusing to authorize the appointment by President Hoover of a commission to investigate conditions in Haiti on the ground that the Chief Executive already has this authority, the Senate instead today adopted a resolution providing $50,000 for an inquiry "by such means as the President may determine."

The proposal to appoint a commission, made by President Hoover after recent disturbances in Haiti, was turned down by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The authority, which is held unnecessary by the committee, was granted by the House, so the resolution will now be returned to that branch to reconcile differences in the two measures.

No record vote was taken on the Senate action.

TEAGUE ON WAY TO CALIFORNIA

Farm Board Member Will Study Grape Situation

Permanent Stabilization Plan to be Mapped Out

Market Expert Denies He Will Run for Governor

BY LAURENCE M. BENEDICT
Times Staff Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Charles C. Teague of Santa Paula, Cal., co-operative marketing commissioner on the Federal Farm Board, left Washington tonight for California to make a study of problems facing the grape growers of the State and attempt to map out a permanent stabilization program for the industry.

His mission is one of those first-hand surveys which the Federal Farm Board is making to assist ailing agricultural industries and as the outstanding co-operative expert of his own State if not of the nation there is no question but that Mr. Teague was the man to undertake the board's work in California.

BAD MARKET BLAMED

He plans to spend two weeks in California, making investigations along his own line to supplement his already broad knowledge of the ills of the grape people and conferring with leaders in the industry.

The Farm Board has given the California grape growers a commodity loan of 3 cents a pound on raisins this year, aggregating more than $5,000,000, and banking interests have matched the advance with the result the industry has been placed temporarily on its feet. The thing now is to help the industry work out a plan whereby it may be placed on a permanently prosperous basis.

Just before taking the train, Commissioner Teague said that the problem of the grape growers was "one of a demoralized market that has existed in all directions for a number of years" and which has been due both to overproduction and lack of proper distribution methods.

His purpose, then, will be to analyze the situation and try to present a definite plan for reorganization of the industry, perhaps along the lines which have proved so successful in the case of his own co-operatives, the California Fruit Growers' and Walnut Growers' exchanges. Mr. Teague's creation and management of these two organizations—probably the most successful farm co-operatives in the United States—was what brought him national recognition and led to President Hoover's insistence that he take a place on the Federal Farm Board when it was formed last year.

POLITICS FIRMLY DENIED

The fruit and walnut growers' exchanges have been so successful in looking out for themselves that they are in the comparatively small group of co-operatives in the country which have not petitioned for financial aid under the Federal farm relief program, and all this is a tribute to Mr. Teague's genius in directing their affairs.

Upon his return to Washington, Commissioner Teague will make a report to the Farm Board on what he has learned about conditions among the California grape producers, whether further Federal loans may be needed or merited, what is being done to safeguard the loan already advanced and what sort of plan has been worked out for putting the industry in the profit column.

Asked if the movement of some weeks ago to get him to run for the Republican nomination for Governor might not be renewed when he reached California Mr. Teague said he "hoped this matter had been disposed of" with his refusal to consider becoming a candidate.

He said that while he appreciated the tribute of friends who suggested he run for Governor, he had made it plain at all times that he would not be a candidate, and would make it plain again if the question should be raised while he was back home.

"I am going to California on Farm Board business, not politics," he declared.

Mrs. Teague is accompanying the commissioner.

Webb Asserts Law Permits Brew in Home

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Home brew for home consumption is not illegal in California, it was said today by Atty.-Gen. Webb, an opinion which met with the concurrence of Col. George Seavey, assistant prohibition administrator for this district. Webb's assertion came in the form of a comment on a Congressional speech in which Representative Fort of New Jersey said the Volstead Act does not prevent the making of home brew.

Webb interprets the California Wright Act as a sustaining measure of the Volstead Act and declares the law of either is not applicable to liquid made in the home unless they are sold.

Under this interpretation, beer, wine and cider can be brewed if not sold, but may be used only for home consumption.

Reina Optimismo Acerca del Porvenir de Méjico

CIUDAD DE MEJICO, Febrero 1.—Con el cambio de gobierno que va a verificarse aquí el próximo miércoles, celebrará Méjico el advenimiento de una era de paz interior, que parece legítimo esperar, dada la creencia general de que se inicia, por fin un programa de solida y concreta reconstrucción. No deja, con todo, de ofrse decir que Méjico es el país de las conmociones imprevistas, y que de ellas está llena su historia.

Empero, ni siquiera los descontentos irreconciliables, ni los intervencionistas, pueden negar que se anuncia un alba sonrosada en el horizonte político de Méjico. No sólo por lo que respecta a su situación interior, sino por lo que ve a sus relaciones con el mundo exterior, y con los Estados Unidos en particular, parece hallarse Méjico al comienzo de una nueva era, esa era por la que casi todo el mundo ha venido suspirando desde la caída del general don Porfirio Díaz en 1911.

Se Acerca la Toma de Posesión de Ortiz Rubio

CIUDAD DE MEJICO, Febrero 1. Como Emilio Portes Gil, a quien va a suceder en la presidencia el próximo miércoles, el presidente electo Pascual Ortiz Rubio ha destacado su figura de la noche a la mañana. Pocos, o quizá ninguno, de los mejor informados observadores de la política mejicano habría predicho hace catorce meses, que el entonces embajador mejicano en Río de Janeiro llegaría a ser presidente constitucional de una república revolucionaria; di que es sobrino de un arzobispo, a hijo de un gobernador de Estado, que desempeñó tal puesto bajo la dictadura conservadora del general Díaz.

Ortiz Rubio es un hombre que anda en los 53 años, pues nació en el de 1877 en la ciudad de Morelia, capital del Estado de Michoacán. Su padre, don Pascual Ortiz Rubio, Sr., fue abogado de gran reputación. El nuevo presidente fue alumno del Colegio de San Nicolás de Hidalgo, en Morelia, institución histórica, de la que fue en una época rector el Padre Hidalgo, primer héroe de la independencia mejicana. En la Escuela de Ingenieros de la ciudad de Méjico, se recibió más adelante el señor Ortiz Rubio de ingeniero civil.

Dos Retratos de la Nieta de Roosevelt

WASHINGTON, Febrero 1.—Por primera vez en su vida va a ser retratada al óleo Paulinita Longworth, y tal acontecimiento es para celebrar, el 14 de Febrero, el quinto natalicio de la simpática mocosilla.

Con esa conciencia y exactitud que no puede menos de haber heredado de su famoso abuelo, la hijita del presidente de la cámara va a hacerse retratar por partida doble. Dos artistas húngaras hermanas, Elena y Berta de Hellebranth, están pintando a Paulinita desde sus respectivos e individuales puntos de vista, y las dos trabajan con el pincel al mismo tiempo.

Elena ha cogido a la chiquilla en actitud de travesura; el retrato de Berta traza la fisonomía de la niña en un rato de seriedad. Paulinita examina ambos lienzos, y, tras detenida reflexión, mueve la cabeza convencida, y dice: "Sí, esa soy yo".

Ultima Lucha de Asa Keyes

El defensor del ex-fiscal Asa Keyes, convicto este último con Ed H. Rosenberg de conspiración de soborno, y cuya apelación ha sido denegada por el Tribunal de Apelaciones, va a hacer mañana los últimos esfuerzos desesperados para librar de la penitenciaría de San Quintín a sus dos citados clientes.

Dentro de unos treinta días sabrán los presos si han de ir o no al penal a cumplir una sentencia de uno a catorce años de prisión, pues ese tiempo tardarán en resolverse los dos únicos recursos que les quedan: una petición de nueva audiencia al Tribunal de Apelaciones, y, de fallar ésta, otra petición análoga a la Suprema Corte del Estado de California.

Probablemente no Fue Incendiario el Fuego que Quemó a Eva González

Los tenientes detectives Romero y Torre, tras haber interrogado ayer a una docena de mejicanos, más o menos, de los que viven cerca de donde ocurrió el trágico suceso, han llegado a la conclusión de que seguramente no fue de carácter incendiario la conflagración en la que perdió la vida, quemada, la niña de 7 años de edad, Eva González.

Por informes que recibieron los policías, se sabía que desde hace varios meses había mortales rencores entre varias familias mejicanas domiciliadas en el 341 1-2 de la calle de Order, y lo del incendiarismo había parecido lógico cuando se supo que Manuel Delgado fue atacado por la madre de la niña. Delgado dijo al capitán Cato que había ido a ver a la señora González para exigirle se retractara de chismes que había contado acerca de Delgado. La respuesta de ella fue irsele encima con un martillo.

El incendio en que perdió la vida la chiquilla ocurrió unas cuantas horas después del incidente referido, y de allí que Delgado fuera interrogado antes que nada. El cuerpo carbonizado de la criatura fue hallado entre las ruinas por el guardia Anthony.

SENATE SCORED BY NEW MEMBER

Lobbyist Grundy Quoted by Legislative Jokers

Target Retorts Horseplay Justifies Remarks

Important Business Let Slide, He Says, for Foolery

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—Speaking up for the first time in the Senate today, Senator Grundy, Republican, Pennsylvania, replied to a half-hour's discussion of himself by chiding the various Senators for spending time on him.

Senator Blaine, Republican, Wisconsin, read to the Senate the speech made a year ago by Grundy before the wool manufacturers, expressing concern over the tariff bill because of the lack of legislative experience of President Hoover.

"JOSH" PENNSYLVANIAN

There was a round of joshing about the speech with suggestions that Senator Blaine get it to the President, and questioning as to whether the Republicans intended to exclude Grundy from committee places because of his attitude toward the President.

Listening intently in his seat far back in the corner on the Republican side, Grundy smiled frequently with the membership at sharp exchanges of satire. Finally Senator Harrison, Democrat, Mississippi, who had questioned the authenticity of the Grundy speech, said the silence of the Pennsylvanian confirmed its truth.

ONE CREDIT MARK

"That is one credit for the junior Senator from Pennsylvania," remarked Senator Borah of Idaho. "He never denies anything."

Then Grundy spoke up. His voice did not carry well and some Senators did not seem to be able to hear him. He said:

"I made that speech about a year ago. However, as it was an impromptu speech I could not recall the subject matter or the details of it and only in part caught the substance of it from the reading by the Senator from Wisconsin.

STRICTURES JUSTIFIED

"The exhibition that has gone on here this afternoon for the last half-hour, in my opinion, justifies about everything that I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to read from his memorandum of what I said, if in this discussion I may exclude any references to the President of the United States.

"I think this exhibition certainly ought to be notice to every right-thinking person of the United States as to the character of discussion which is occupying the time and attention of some members of the Senate to the exclusion of important problems which are now confronting the country."

Stolen Jewels to be Returned

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Mrs. Mattie Wells of Bakersfield was allowed temporary freedom on her own recognizance today on condition she aid police in recovering jewels valued at $7500 stolen from the home of Mrs. Lloyd Dinkelspiel last June.

Mrs. Wells was arrested recently and charged with receiving stolen property when she offered to return $12,500 worth of jewels for the insurance reward. She told police they were given her by a man who offered $250 if she would collect the reward. The $7500 represents the amount still missing.

PRISON MENACED BY FIRE

Convicts Suspected of Setting Blaze in Colorado Penitentiary, Scene of Recent Bloody Riot

CANON CITY (Colo.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Fire raced through the tailor shop at the State penitentiary here today, for a while threatening serious consequences, and was quenched only after more than three hours work by fire departments from Canon City and Florence, a few miles away.

Possibly of incendiary origin, the flames were checked after they had destroyed property valued tentatively at from $10,000 to $15,000. The scene of wholesale slaughter last October, when Danny Daniels and Jimmy Pardue, convict desperadoes, organized and carried through a bloody mutiny, the penitentiary today in sharp contrast was quiet and the prisoners orderly.

Warden Francis E. Crawford tonight was investigating reports that the fire was started by prisoners who repeatedly have threatened to "burn down the whole penitentiary" unless William Green, deputy warden, is removed. Green is looked upon at the prison as the target for the prisoners' bitter animosity. On three other occasions, it was said at the administrative offices, fires have been started in or near the tailor shop since the October riot in which eight guards and five convicts lost their lives.

Four men were injured. Danny Reardon, one of the prisoners granted "good time" by Gov. Adams recently for helping save State property during the October mutiny and fire, was stabbed in the arm during an altercation with another convict. Another prisoner fell from a ladder while attempting to help quench the flames.

National Guardsmen were called out for patrol duty and the convicts were herded into the cell houses or marched into the "bull pen" as the smoke started pouring from the tailor shop. The large supply room beneath the tailor shop was protected from damage by water by laying canvas over the stores. Guards who were off duty at the time were hurriedly mobilized as a precautionary measure.

Warden Crawford, who kept Gov. Adams at Denver advised by telephone of developments, promptly denied persistent rumors that the fire provided a cover for an attempted prison break. The convicts, he asserted, were orderly at all times and the National Guardsmen and a machine gun hastily mounted on the wall of the institution were merely for precaution against a possible mutiny.

Reardon, the convict who was stabbed, talked rather freely before the gubernatorial committee which investigated the October riot and prior to that is understood to have informed prison authorities of a plotted prison break being engineered by Daniels and Pardue.

At Denver, George A. Crowder, deputy assistant Attorney-General, announced he would recommend the removal of Deputy Warden Green from service inside the penitentiary in his findings to be submitted to Robert E. Winbourne, Attorney-General, within a few days. Crowder has been conducting a further investigation of the October riot for the special investigating committee.

Warden Crawford said the fire loss is covered by insurance.

LONDON, Feb. 1. (AP)—Frank Meidinger, the Australian who for thirty-three years was senior valet to King Edward, left an estate valued at $640.

Romance Ends in Damage Suit

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 1. (AP)—M. J. McGranahan, San Francisco attorney, today filed a $30,000 damage suit in his own behalf against I. M. Muller, director of a steel-products company, charging slander.

The suit, said McGanahan, is the outgrowth of a blighted romance between Muller's daughter, a Mrs. Lucas of Los Angeles, and his client, E. I Feidler.

McGranahan said that during the asserted engagement Mrs. Lucas gave Feidler, his client, some property which he sold. The deal was with Mrs. Lucas's consent, McGranahan declared.

When the engagement was broken, McGranahan said, he called on Muller in his offices here to discuss the affair, and that in the presence of several persons Muller berated him as attorney for Feidler, thereby injuring his feelings.

WIRELESS DEAL INQUIRY OPENS

Senate Committee Examines Into Proposed Merger

Radio and Telegraph Group Records Scrutinized

Data Sought as to Activities of Morgan Interests

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—Investigation of correspondence relating to the proposed merger of the communications facilities of the Radio Corporation of America with the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation, to ascertain what part J. P. Morgan & Co. played in the negotiations, was begun today by the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee.

The correspondence was turned over to the committee by Sosthenes Behn, chairman of the telegraph corporation, who denied that the Morgan banking concern had "brought pressure to bear" in favor of the merger.

Referring to the Radio Corporation as "our fiances," Behn said the Morgan interests "have never indicated to us that marriage was even desirable."

At an executive session this afternoon, the committee decided unanimously to turn the correspondence over to attorneys for the telegraph company and committee counsel to determine what part is relevant. Behn then will be recalled, probably next week, for further questioning.

A tentative agreement has been reached between the two companies whereby the communications facilities of the Radio Corporation will be purchased for stock in the International Telephone and Telegraph valued at the present market price at about $78,000,000, and with a par value of $40,000,000. At the time the merger was proposed last summer the market price of the stock was about $100,000,000.

Unbeaten Bulldog Basketballers Triumph, 58 to 16, and Climb Nearer Cage Championship

The bounding basketballers of Redlands University advanced another notch nearer the Southern California cage championship last night by routing the Caltech Engineers, 58 to 16, at Pasadena.

Coach Ashel Cunhingham's brilliant quintet put on a spectacular exhibition of cassba-caging in the final half to snow under the Caltech forces, who hadn't made such a bad showing in the first period. In that second-half spree the Bulldog five hooped in 36 points, meanwhile holding the Engineers to 3 digits.

The score at half-time favored Redlands, 22 to 13.

Scoring honors for the evening were carried off by Bell, stellar Bulldog forward, who found the hoop for 21 points. Capt. Lee registered 11 counters and Keele accounted for a dozen points to help Bell run up the Redlands score. Pratt, with 9 points, was the leading Caltech scorer.

Glendale Has Edge in Race

With the Coast League basketball season just half over Coach Bert Stanley's Glendale cagers appear to have a decided edge over the remaining teams in the loop.

The Dynamiters have won all five of their games in an impressive manner. However, they have not yet played the powerful San Diego quintet, who is a runner-up with four wins and two loses. These two teams will meet in a two-game series next Friday and Saturday in the Glendale gym.

Unless the Hilltoppers come through with a couple of wins Glendale will cop the title in a walk.

The climax of the Dynamiters' recent victories came when they won a two-game series from the Long Beach Jackrabbits. It marked the first time in eight years that Long Beach had lost a basketball game to Glendale.

Whatever the result of the pending games may be the winner will be in a most advantageous position to make a bid for the title.

The standings:

Glendale	5	1	.833
San Diego	4	1	.800
Long Beach	3	3	.500
Pasadena	2	4	.333

LURE OF AVIATION USED BY ASSERTED SWINDLERS

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (AP)—Seven men and one woman who said they wanted to learn how to fly and had paid for the privilege, only to be disappointed, today secured warrants against officials of the Aviation Service and Transport Company, Inc., charging operation of a confidence game. Four individuals, including President D. MacKenzie, were named in the charges.

The eight plaintiffs said they had answered advertisements in which Aviation Service and Transport Company, Inc., "painted in glowing terms the thrill of flying." The ads, they said, promised each and every student taking the course offered by the concern a license.

But the licenses were not forthcoming, according to the charges. Sums of money ranging from $60 to $1000 were spent by each of the plaintiffs, they said. After the money was paid, they declared, they learned that the equipment and facilities controlled by the aviation company were "inadequate." They believed that Mr. McKenzie, as president; T. L. Evans, treasurer; C. A. Robarge, sales manager, and John Miller, vice-president, "conspired to mulct them."

The woman who wanted to learn aviation is Miss Josephine McGovack, 30 years of age, of Chicago. The others are Harold Travers, Albany, N. Y.; Ralph Burdon, Chicago; Virgil Emdsley, Omaha; Edward Dickson, Wyoming, Pa.; Thomas Cain, deaf mute, of Flint, Mich.; Arthur G. Vaughan, Denver, Colo., and John Podwika, Wyoming, Pa.

AUTO GUNMEN KILL CHICAGOAN

Former Crime Investigator Gets Six Bullets

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (AP)—Julius Rosenheim, 45 years of age, formerly an investigator for the Chicago Crime Commission, was shot to death today by two men who stepped from an automobile to the sidewalk and fired six shots into his body. They escaped in the automobile, driven by a third man.

Police said the shooting apparently was gangland's revenge upon the "squawker."

Six weeks ago Rosenheim walked into the State Attorney's office. He was on the "inside" of vice and gambling in Chicago, he said, and offered to tell what he knew.

The State's Attorneys listened, but were skeptical. They ordered him to go out and bring in some of the principals. Rosenheim did not return.

GILMORE OIL NET INCOME SHARPLY UP

Eight Months' Earnings Total $471,479, Equal to $2.50 Per Share

Gilmore Oil Company, Ltd., for the eight months ended November 30, last, yesterday reported net earnings of $471,479.35 after all charges and reserve for Federal income taxes, equal to $2.50 a share on 189,411 shares of no-par capital stock outstanding. These earnings show an increase of $198,220.02, or 72.53 per cent over the $273,249.33 for the corresponding period of the preceding year and an increase of $6385 over the total earnings for the entire fiscal year ended March 31, last.

Inclusive of undivided earnings from subsidiary and affiliated companies for the eight months' period, the earnings totaled $665,947.21, or $3.53 per share, according to C. S. Beesemyer, vice-president of the company.

Sales for the period amounted to $4,912,219, an increase of $1,064,571, or 27.67 per cent, over the previous corresponding period. The greater increase in net profits in relation to gain in sales was atributed by Mr. Beesemyer to operating economies now effected. Gallonage of gasoline sales jumped from 17,403,749 to 24,692,869, a gain of 7,489,140 gallons, or 43 per cent, reflecting the expansion of distribution facilites for the company's patented gasoline on the Pacific Coast and in New Zealand.

The balance sheet as of November, 30, last, showed current assets of $1,067,968.39 and current liabilities of $755,194.63. Total assets were listed at $3,959,388.62 and total net worth given at $2,266,719.28. Surplus increased from $312,696.93 on April 1, last, to $892,431.28 on November 30, last. Dividends paid during the eight months' period amounted to $110,952.

BUSINESS RISE DUE SOON

Eastern Centers Report Corner Turned, and Recovery Expected Around End of Month

BY EARLE E. CROWE

Improvement in stock prices in the past week is traceable to the rising sentiment emanating from eastern business centers that the end of a short business recession is in sight. Some authorities in semi-confidential reports assert that business has already turned the corner, while others lean to the view that a definite rise should materialize by the end of February or some time in March.

These sanguine expressions in many instances come from business leaders who recently thought the recession would run at least until the middle of the year. They profess now to see evidence of mounting unfilled orders in different lines, indicating increasing activity among the industries. They note that the equipment makers are busy, always one of the first signs of business revival.

MONEY EASE SEEN

Construction activity is expected to gain momentum around the early part of the summer, aided by the prospect for money and credit at reasonable rates. The Federal Reserve authorities, according to the prevalent opinion, will lend constructive assistance to maintain easiness in the money market, but will not permit the speculators to run away with the credit supply as they did last year.

Most of the unfavorable business news is out, it is reported. The Fox Film, Kolster Radio and similar affairs were unsettling influences, but it is not believed that any more major receivership actions are contemplated. Probably there will be a few more dividend omissions and reductions affecting the smaller companies.

The same people who speak so optimistically of the business situation are not so definite in respect to the stock market. The current rise is attributed to the cheerful sentiment on business, but the opinion is held, nevertheless, that technically the stock market has still some internal obstacles to overcome. Ordinarily it would be expected that a rise in security prices would precede the revival in business provided the stock market has its own house in order.

WEAK SPOTS MENDED

The internal phase of business is receiving considerable attention. All down the line measures have been taken to reinforce weak spots in management and physical operation which were disclosed in the last quarter of 1929. The air of flush-time prosperity has been dissipated and directors are insisting that corporations rigorously apply methods to meet with the probability of lower gross income for the year. With this campaign in effect it is likely that corporations will end the year in much stronger shape internally.

Some unscrambling of mergers made under the urge of banking groups to sell new securities to the public is a possibility. In several instances it is understood that some of the new consolidations have been found unwieldy and unprofitable, and steps will be taken to segregate the properties into more suitable units. The few new mergers anticipated will be predicated on the discovery under the light of declining business that operations must be broader and larger to obtain the maximum of efficiency.

One of the significant indices of the state of business is found in the reports of the chain-store systems. These distributing units reach into all corners of the country, and almost without exception reported increases in December sales and also for the first few weeks in January. Evidently there has been no diminution in mass retail buying.

BROKERS SCAN MARKET SKY

Spring-Street Operators Give Views on Probable Trend of Prices in Near Future

What Spring-street brokers think of the present status of the stock market and the probable future trend of prices is summarized in the following opinions:

The absence of pyrotechnics and the fact that volume remains steady and shows no sign of sudden increase is reassuring to traders who are on the watch for evidences of technical reaction. It is still a day-to-day market, but maintaining an even tenor and there are few indications of overbought conditions which, if existent, might precipitate serious reaction.—Norman B. Courteney, E. A. Pierce & Co.

Developments during the week has confirmed our previous opinion that the stock market is definitely, if somewhat slowly, improving its position. We believe that the trend is upward, but that its progress will necessarily be marked by periodic recessions. We feel, however, that each succeeding line of resistance will be at higher levels as public participation increases. We think that the long pull investor will wait a long time before finding better buying opportunities in good stocks than exist currently.—Ray S. Bossitter, Leib, Keyston & Co.

Last week closed with the most active sessions of the new year. The decided manner in which stocks advanced, and held their gains, appears to leave little doubt that a definite upward trend has now been established. While business continues to make slow progress in many directions, fear of a serious or prolonged slump is gradually passing. However, once the belief becomes general that business has turned the corner and the worst of the depression passes, the stock market will take care of itself. It seems quite probable, therefore, that the month of February will, in the general trend of the market, represent a further distinct improvement in stock prices.—Wilcox Drake, Wilcox Drake & Co.

Quite a list of stocks scored further gains during the week, with here and there a lively display of strength in sharp contrast to the feeble action that had preceded. While such a demonstration may not yet be conclusive that a sustained upward movement has set in, it has gone far to show a breadth of public interest that so recently seemed lacking. There are usually false starts before a market gets really under way but, regardless of any minor recessions, we believe that the trend is upward to be followed later by wide public participation.—Jno. O. Knight, Los Angeles Investment Securities Company.

The long-expected spring advance in the stock market is now well under way and we can look forward to a continuation of advancing prices. The market has not progressed to all sections, however, but the rise has been of a selective nature with premier investment stocks heading the list. We are of the opinion that many stocks are selling at lower prices now than will again be encountered this year. Any recession should be used to increase commitments.—J. D. Kennedy, H. J. Barneson & Co.

Further upbidding of selected issues characterized the market during the past week. The general tone of the whole market was noticeably improved and a larger volume of trading resulted. The apparent success of these operations is encouraging a growing number of operators to experiment with their favorite issues. The movement has the appearance of an ability to carry through to moderately high levels. It is well to remember that at current prices, many issues are low enough with relations to their value (actual or potential) to justify their purchase as a long-term investment, irrespective of intermediate moves.—Frank L. Gardner, Banks, Huntley & Co.

The market has clearly demonstrated its underlying strength. Despite the fact that a public following has not been created, stocks have moved forward into new high ground under the impetus of an evergrowing number of strong pool operations and bullish business developments. The public utility stocks have given a highly commendable performance, as attested by the action of Southern California Edison in moving forward despite the rights overhanging the market. Stocks in this group are closely held, conditions in the field are ideal, and the sponsorship is excellent. Under such conditions we look for further demonstrations of strength on the part of the public utilities.—Frank F. Hargear, Sutro & Co.

Technically, the market has been weakened by the advance of over 22 points in a fortnight due to the elimination of a considerable part of the short interest. Theoretically, a temporary reaction at least should be expected some time during the coming week.—Thomas B. Robinson, Jones, Hubbard & Donnell, Inc.

Increasing operations in the steel and automobile industry; signs of improved employment conditions and the number of favorable indications warranted to increase the United States export trade such as gold shipments out of the country, are some of the reasons we are recommending selected issues in which we feel the fundamental conditions favor an advance. The market is beginning to show the effect of these favorable factors.—C. C. Streeter, C. C. Streeter & Co.

LOCAL DIVIDEND PAYMENTS HIGH

Survey Given Out by Stock Exchange Manager

January Figures on Listed Issues $24,219,182

Gain Over Previous Period Set at $11,038,319

January dividend disbursements by companies, the stocks of which are listed on the Los Angeles Stock Exchange, reached an aggregate of $24,219,182, a jump of 83.7 per cent over January, 1929, disbursements of $13,180,863, and a gain of 120.6 per cent over the payment of $10,974,109, reported for January, 1928, F. E. Sanford, secretary and manager of the exchange, announced yesterday.

Mr. Sanford, in issuing the compilation, pointed out that while the activity of stock markets throughout the country fell below the level for January of last year, the dividend record is an indication that the prosperity of corporations in general has continued. Dividends declared in January for payment in February exceeded $30,500,000.

Total shares listed on the exchange at the close of the month numbered 127,279,439, as compared with 114,550,369 in January, 1929, and 97,682,075, an increase of 12,720,070 shares, or 11 per cent over last year, and a gain of 29,597,364 shares, or more than 30 per cent over the past two years.

During the month just closed the market value of all securities listed increased about $270,000,000, reaching a total of $6,394,519,015. This compares with a market values of more than $5,000,000,000 in January, 1929, and $3,860,000,000 in January, 1928.

The average price of stock listed on the exchange amounted to $50.24 a share during the month of January, as against $46.91 a share for December; $44.88 in January, 1929, and $39.51 in January, 1928.

The exchange has passed a number of regulations during the past year for the purpose of placing the stocks on a higher and more stable price basis. One rule was that all stocks had to be of $10 par value a share or more if they were not of the "no-par-value variety. This has tended to weed out the many "penny stocks."

Ticker Tales Heard in Wall Street Rounds

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive) The report for Loew's, Inc., for sixteen weeks ending about March 10, next, is expected to show an increase of about 50 per cent over last year. In the 1929 period, Loew's reported earnings of $3,149,929, so that the corporation should show about $4,500,000 for the corresponding term this year. Loew's has not been affected or involved in any way by the difficulties of the Fox companies, although control is held by Fox Theaters Corporation.

Although 1929 must be considered an unsatisfactory year for cement companies generally, International Cement Corporation will report only a slight decrease in profits as compared with the banner year of 1928. Net earnings for 1929 will amount to nearly $5,000,000, and will be equal to better than $7.50 a share on 619,031 common shares outstanding. This will compare with $5,149,400, or $7.90 a common share earned in 1928.

Reflecting a continued increase in production and sales during 1929 the annual report of Foster, Wheeler Corporation, which will be published late this month, is expected to reveal record net income in excess of $1,600,000 after interest, depreciation and Federal taxes, equal after preferred dividends, to about $6.25 a share on the outstanding common stock. This will exceed the 1928 net of $804,394, or $2.80 a common share, by approximately $300,000 and represent an increase of about 100 per cent.

Texas Gulf Net Shows Increase

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive) Texas Gulf Sulphur Company, Inc., reported today net income for 1929 of $16,247,478 after all charges, including taxes, equivalent to $6.40 a share on the 2,500,000 capital shares outstanding, against $14,517,619, or $5.17 a share on the same share basis in 1928.

Net income for the quarter closed December 31, last, amounted to $4,766,989, or $2 cents a share, against $4,038,950, or $1.58 a share, in the preceding quarter. The net income for the last quarter of 1928 totaled $4,162,238, or $1.64 a share.

UTILITY SYSTEM ADDS TO HOLDINGS

General Water Works and Electric Corporation, under the management of American Equities Corporation, has added new properties to its system, increasing its property account in the last two months of 1929 from $60,500,000 to $62,500,000, it was announced yesterday. There is now an equity of about $310 a share behind the 7 per cent preferred stock.

BANKERS' TRUST FILES CLAIMS AGAINST FOX

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—The Bankers' Trust Company today entered in State courts judgment for $501,939 against Fox Film Corporation, the amount alleged to be due on a note October 9, last, payable January 9, last.

DEEPER OIL CUT HELD NEED

New York Leader in Industry Quoted as Advocate of More Drastic Curtailment

BY JOHN F. SINCLAIR

[Copyright, 1930, by the North American Newspaper Alliance]

NEW YORK, Feb. 1.—"To clear up the situation in the oil industry, more drastic restrictive measures in the oil fields must be worked out this year, either voluntarily or arbitrarily," said an oil leader in New York this week.

The year 1929 broke the record in that the production of crude oil in the United States for the first time in history surpassed 1,000,000,000 barrels—12 per cent more than the 1928 record. This in spite of the fact that some 10,000,000 barrels of crude oil was shut in by different proration agreements.

World oil production in 1929 was 1,460,000,000 barrels. So the United States produced more than two-thirds of the world's total.

The year closed with total oil stocks on hand of 530,000,000 barrels — a new high record, sufficient to supply American requirements for seven or eight months.

So today the United States, producing 2,800,000 barrels daily, is far in the lead in oil production, followed by Venezuela, Russia, Persia, Mexico, Rumania, Dutch East Indies, Colombia and Peru, in the order named.

Venezuela, second on the list, has a production of but .13 per cent of that of the United States.

Just before Thomas E. Mitten, the great Philadelphia transportation genius, was drowned a few months ago on his estate near Philadelphia, he declared that the huge industrial units in the making were in danger of losing their conception of the labor problem as active management is further removed from the worker.

Said Mr. Mitten:

"(1.) We must give the worker a full voice, equal to that of the management, in all matters that affect his wages and working conditions.

"(2.) We must give the worker assurance of a fair rate in wages, and also added reward in accordance with the success of his efforts.

"(3.) We must see that the worker is given full opportunity to invest his own capital in the work shop in which he earns his daily bread, and see to it that this investment is of such a nature that will give the worker so great an influence in management that American industry will always be assured of a management in sympathy with labor."

Since his death, the principles which he laid down have been continued by a loyal staff, built up during his active business career.

Honduras, which specialises largely in coffee and bananas, suffered from a slight business depression during last year. Late reports show that during 1929 Honduras exported 28,241,000 bunches of bananas, compared with 27,462,000 bunches in 1928, although during the month of December the total export amounted to 2,059,000 bunches, as compared with 1,544,000 bunches in the same month of 1928.

Again the United States leads in the total number of bananas imported. For in December last, of the total exported by Honduras, 1,720,000 bunches came into the United States; 170,000 bunches were taken by England; and 168,000 by Germany.

The coming coffee crop of Honduras is reported to be good. But with low prices, advances and credits have been greatly restricted.

This picture indicates about the general trend of business throughout South America.

Roos Bros., Inc., Issues Report

Roos Bros., Inc., reported yesterday net income for 1929 of $230,989 after charges, including a nonrecurring expense and Federal taxes, equivalent after preferred dividends to $3.43 a share on 80,000 common shares outstanding, against $370,704 in 1928 after regular charges, equal to $3.82 a common share. The nonrecurring charge totaled $39,000 and was the expense incurred in opening the new Hollywood store.

Sales for the year were the greatest in the history of the company, totaling $5,412,813, and represented an increase of $72,153, or 7.3 per cent, over 1928. Only a portion of the increase represented the operations of the new unit added during the year, it was stated. All previously established stores showed a substantial increase, according to the report.

Auto Equipment Earnings Told

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—While the certified audit has not been completed as yet, preliminary figures indicate that the net profits of Borg-Warner Corporation for 1929 should be at least $7,650,000 after all charges and before preferred dividends, C. S. Davis, president, announced today, following a directors' meeting. The meeting was largely of a routine nature.

"That there is a distinct revival occurring in the automobile industry is indicated by increased shipping specifications now being received by the divisions of the Borg-Warner Corporation," he said. The annual report will be issued in about three weeks.

KLEIBER TRUCK NET PROFITS SHOW GAIN

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Kleiber Motor Company announced today net income for 1929 after charges of $139,564, equal to 43 cents a share on approximately 318,040 common shares outstanding December 31, last. This compares with $65,859, or 27 cents a share on 227,176 common shares in 1928.

BUYING NIL ON COTTON BELT MART

Farm Board Warning of Overproduction Clouds Situation at Memphis

MEMPHIS, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—While general unrest is pervading the cotton market, due to statements attributed to the Federal Farm Board recently as well as the board's warning of overproduction, heavy price fixing by mills is reported this week-end as a result of the decline in prices this week.

The spot cotton market is very dull and with shippers fairly well-stocked up, the action of the mills is not expected to materially affect premiums. Actual demand is practically nil and sales in Memphis have been much below normal for several days. Longs in the future market are liquidating here as well as elsewhere and there is no trace of buying in of hedges at the present time to support the price.

The unsold stocks at Memphis showed a small decline for the week, now being 57,622 bales out of a total stock of 423,000 bales.

Much interest here is still centered on the action of the Mississippi and the St. Francis rivers in view of the high water. Present flood is receding so slowly that further hint is given of a channel full of water when the spring volume starts withiin a very few weeks. Breaks in minor levees in Eastern Arkansas that have just flooded nearly 300,000 acres cannot be permanently repaired before the spring rise comes in the St. Francis River. From all indications, the streams in this region will play a major part in the general campaign sponsored by State agricultural colleges, bankers and business men to reduce acreage on the Farm Board's recommendation. This drive is gaining momentum and promises to be the most concentrated witnessed in the cotton belt in a decade.

For nearly thirty days now harvest has been at a standstill, but most of the remaining cotton is beyond salvage after having experienced the prolonged spell of wet and cold weather. Traders here say it will possibly bring from 7 to 9 cents and farmers usually balk at picking the residue of any crop that brings less than 10 cents.

Market Trends Hit Irregular Levels in Week

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—A brisk upturn in stock prices which carried the general index of ninety stocks to the highest level since the November panic and the break in wheat and cotton futures to new low levels for the season were the highly contrasting features in this week's financial and commodities markets. Bond prices eased somewhat because of the competition of new offerings of $127,000,000 this week, which were about $50,000,000 above those of a week ago.

The rally in stocks was distributed over a fairly broad list with the public utility, merchandising and steel issues making the best showing, and the coppers, railroad equipment and oils the greatest laggards. Trading showed a marked expansion in volume, Saturday's sales running close to 3,000,000 shares, with the ticket twenty-two minutes late in recording the final quotation.

Credit conditions showed an easier tendency. Call money renewed on Friday at 4 per cent, the lowest opening rate in two years, but was marked up to 4 1-2 before the close because of the heavy demand for funds in connection with weekly pay rolls and month-end settlements. Bankers' acceptances were reduced 1-8 of 1 per cent.

DIVIDEND RATE CUT

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—A reduction in the dividend rate on the common stock of the Ohio Seamless Tube Company of Shelby, O., manufacturers of tubing for the automotive and airplane industries, was announced by directors today. A quarterly payment of 50 cents was voted, placing the stock on a $2 annual basis instead of $4.

COTTON MARKET

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—The cotton market was higher today on week-end covering and trade buying, accompanied by talk of a firmer technical position and encouraged by the somewhat steadier tone of Liverpool. May contracts gained up to 11.90, making a net advance of 23 points and a recovery of 29 points from the low of yesterday, but reacted slightly under realizing and closed at 11.86. The general market closed steady at net advances of 12 to 15 points.

COTTONSEED OIL

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The cottonseed market was dull today, but the undertone was steadier and prices closed nominally 2 to 3 points net higher. The improved sentiment is principally reflected in the lack of offerings and the higher levels of cotton, grains, lard and hogs. Sales, 200 barrels. NEW YORK BOND PRICES

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—Communication Company securities, many of which showed strength in a quiet Saturday bond market. American Telephone 4½s, closing at 103.50, for a net gain of 6½ points, displayed the largest activity in weeks, and turned over to the extent of nearly $1,000,000. Principal amount of the day's volume for the entire list was only $4,100,000.

International Telephone 4½s were a close second. These debentures, which on Thursday sold around 112, soared 9½ points above the Friday close, finishing at 121. The same company's new debentures 5s when issued were active, but failed to carry more than an eighth day's point from the offering price of 99 7/8.

Little activity was apparent elsewhere. Colombian Agricultural, bank for cooperatives, rallied 6 points on reported sinking fund purchases. Siemens & Halske 6½s lost 1 point on the announcement of an additional $30,500,000 issue of long-term debentures for the big German electrical group. This loan, incidentally, marks the largest financing done on this market by a German industrial organization in many months, and the first foreign offering since October. Although public sale of the new bonds is scheduled for next week, the market heard that most of the issue, which carries a participating feature, was being taken by the General Electric Company.

High-grade domestic obligations ruled firm, with the utilities leading higher. The total sales virtually matched those of Monday. Oil 6½s showed better than average activity, although the dollar bonds were small movers.

Dominion Light 4½s, North American Edison 5½s and Pacific Telephone 5s, advanced.

Paths To last 2½s, Cuba Cane Sugar 6s moved up more than 2 points. International Paper 5s were heavy.

There was little action in the Liberties and Treasuries, which eased.

The quotations represent sales of bonds (in thousands of dollars) and the highest and closing prices in order given, to expedite transactions. Bonds dealt in entered where the same as the low, and both low and close when same as high.

OIL NEWS

BY HOWARD KEGLEY

That a new deep-producing zone is about to be discovered by the Hollydale Oil Company's No. 15 on Sec. 36, 27-20, about forty miles south of the Kettleman Hills is indicated by field reports. Most oil operators who hold consolidated acreage in the Lost Hills area are interested in the outcome of a production test to be made there within a week.

Hollydale's No. 15 has six and five-eighth inch casing cemented at 4085 feet with bottom of the hole at 4098 feet after plugging back. Only 100 feet of oil sand is in evidence.

In anticipation of the production test, Belridge has rigged up its "Christmas Tree" and is installing high-pressure connections, as there is considerable gas in evidence. Material for the construction of two 55,000 barrel storage tanks is being trucked in, giving the project the facilities to store its output in the event it proves successful.

Belridge's deep test is the first of any kind for the Lost Hills district. Oil production was discovered 25 years ago by the General Petroleum Corporation, but the deepest production that has been obtained there is at about 2100 feet. Most of the wells yield from a depth of 900 feet.

Operations

Having closed its deal for sixty acres at Huntington Beach, the Pacific Oil Company is now preparing to deepen Borchard No. 1, formerly drilled to about 4350 feet by Cornerstone & Preston. The well will be deepened to at least 5000 feet in an attempt to make it a producer as well. The hole will be deepened because it was discovered to be quite crooked, when surveyed recently.

Drilling Results

Before starting a test on its Rubio property of 360 acres on Sec. 14-4s, in Santa Barbara county, the Barnsdall Oil Company is awaiting the outcome of the Ohio Oil Company's Salsipuedes No. 1 now drilling below 1000 feet. Barnsdall's well will eventually go down within short distance of the Hurst test which went to about 3200 feet in search of production although abandoned for failure to encounter showings.

Drilling Continuous

Successful in obtaining a water shut-off, the Petroleum Securities Company's Graham No. 1 in the Huntington portion of the Signal Hill field continues to core excellent oil sand below 6749 feet and cores are considered good to indicate it is at about the same depth at which a number of other properties now been brought in.

Near the corner of Park Lane and Cherry street at Signal Hill, Bixby Holdings No. 1 is drilling ahead in oil sand below 6705 feet. It is a west of Petroleum Securities' Graham No. 1. The Plymouth Oil Company's No. 9 near the corner of Cherry and Ohio streets is drilling ahead in oil and below 5700 feet, according to field reports, and the company is grading location for its No. 10.

Storage Increased

The Southern California Drilling Company was recently compelled to add to its Kraemer No. 1 and No. 2 in the Newhall district for lack of storage to handle their output. Formerly both wells were good for 500 barrels daily, the storage of 1000 barrels of oil was soon filled.

To Report Out

Deputy Paul Grimm's force of clerks succeeded yesterday in reducing the sixth report for the Santa Fe Springs field covering the period from January 16 to 31, inclusive, embracing a schedule of quotas and allowables for the period from the 1st to 15th inst., inclusive.

The new report did not include a field analysis like the last one, but Deputy Grimm announced that one would be prepared within a week. This field's potential is placed at 370,-000 barrels daily for Santa Fe Springs.

It shows a total excess of 23,715 barrels for the last period, giving the field a daily allowable production of 136,585 barrels for the period from the 1st to the 15th inst., inclusive. The total excess production for the last period is 355,722 barrels and the total allowable production for this period is 1,894,375 barrels.

A Few Unsigned

With the new proration agreement for the next ninety days in effect, the paper being circulated by Judge E. D. Reiter for signatures of the various operators for the Santa Fe Spring field still needs a few more to make it 100 per cent effective. As in the past, the Wilshire Oil Company has not signed and will probably be a holdout for the remainder of the proration period, according to reports.

Many Inactive

When the town lot area at Potrero experienced a revival through the completion of several wells, twenty-five projects were started. Sixteen of the tests drilled there now are idle, either because of the poor success in shutting out sand and water or due to fishing jobs and other mechanical difficulties.

Two of the producers that were completed soon after George F. Getty's Parker No. 1 came in have been shut in. Although Thomas Barton's No. 1, near the corner of Queen and Prairie avenues, is reported to be putting out about 500 barrels of oil per day, there is little likelihood just now that many new wells will be started unless the operators experience better success.

Louis G. Simmel's test northwest of the Potrero town lot area and near the brickyard in Inglewood, is drilling below 4300 feet in gray sand. Should this outpost test find something interesting it might stage a campaign of activity in that area as the Ring Exploration Company and several others still hold acreage there.

RUBBER MARKET

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Trading in futures on the rubber exchange of New York today was a quiet affair as prices moved over a narrow range on light volume. The foreign markets offered no incentive for any aggressive activity on either side of the market, but the buying of July by a prominent downtown dealer saw the market a steady tone.

London spot closed steady and 1-16d lower at 9 7-16d, while in Singapore where business was resumed after a holiday of several days' duration, the spot delivery opened stagnant and unchanged at 9 7-16d. Outside spot here closed at 13½c.

Wheat Futures Up Sharply on Brisker Buying

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (AP)—Rebounding today from extreme setbacks suffered yesterday, wheat scored a maximum rise of 4¾ cents a bushel from the downturns to the season's low price record. A jump today in asking prices for Argentine wheat abroad, together with some enlargement of demand from European continental countries was reported, and consequent sharp upturns in Liverpool quotations furnished an immediate stimulus to buyers of future deliveries in Chicago. Besides, estimates were current indicating that the world's acreage of winter wheat this season shows 1.1 per cent reduction compared with a year ago.

Wheat future deliveries in Chicago closed unsettled, 1¼ to 1¾@1⅞c per bushel higher than yesterday's finish. Corn closed ½@⅝c to the up, oats ⅛ to ⅝@⅝c advance and provisions at gains ranging from a shade to 15 cents.

Highest prices for wheat in Chicago were reached on a brisk upturn at the outset of trading after the action of the Liverpool market was known. Meanwhile dispatches were at hand saying that Argentine export shipments were much smaller than expected, with only 1,000,000 bushels clearing away from Argentina to Great Britain out of a total of 13,300,000 bushels shipped overseas by Argentina since the first of the year. However, the opening bulge in Chicago prices led quickly to enlarged selling here.

Operating as a noticeable drag on Chicago wheat prices advanced was the fact that the Winnipeg market appeared to be failing to respond fully to price upturns at other leading centers.

Corn and oats derived firmness from the upturns of wheat values. Besides, the outlook was for unsettled weather promising to hinder movement of the corn crop.

Provisions were helped upward by commission-house purchasing of lard and by packers' support for meat.

RIO GRANDE RAIL SEEKING CONTROL OF MOFFAT LINE

DENVER, Feb. 1. (AP)—An application to acquire a controlling interest in the Denver and Salt Lake (Moffat) Railroad, has been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission by the Denver and Rio Grande Western, said a statement issued here today by J. S. Pyeatt, president of the Denver and Rio Grande Western.

The Denver and Rio Grande said it proposed to acquire 28,969 shares, or 58 per cent of the Denver and Salt Lake's 50,000 outstanding shares.

Of this amount it already has acquired 21,334 shares at $155 a share. It also has agreed to purchase from George H. Burr and Company, 7635 additional shares.

Since construction of the Moffatt tunnel, the application said, negotiations have been under way between the two roads for the Denver and Rio Grande to operate a line from Denver to Salt Lake by using trackage rights over the other line and by constructing the Dotsero cut-off for joint use. These negotiations have never been culminated and the Denver and Rio Grande now seeks to purchase the Denver and Salt Lake as a means of ending the controversy.

TAXI-DANCE GIRLS START FILIPINOS ON WRONG FOOT

Lonely Islanders' Quest for Woman Companionship Brings Problems of Grave National Moment

BY JACKSON BERGER

When Admiral Dewey's guns thundered victoriously against the Spanish at Manila Bay nearly thirty-two years ago, lifting the pall of oppression from the Philippine Islands and bringing them under an American protectorate, they likewise signalized the birth of a racial, social and economic problem, which suddenly has become acute in California.

Trouble began at Watsonville two weeks ago when smoldering resentment in that region against Filipinos flared in violence and riot. During the intervening days other outbreaks have occurred in Filipino centers in California—one Filipino is dead, several whites and islanders injured and offices of a Filipino organization in Stockton have been bombed—and the matter now commands the official attention of the State of California and, to a degree, of the Federal government itself.

The outbreak is commonly said to have grown from a speech introduced by Justice of the Peace R. W. Rohrback of Salinas, at the North Monterey County Chamber of Commerce condemning Filipinos as undesirable citizens. On January 3, first violence occurred when a Filipino dance hall near Watsonville was raided and closed.

Sacramento and San Joaquin River delta, a rich agricultural district. Stockton, regarded as northern headquarters, has from 7000 to 10,000 islanders.

Filipino centers in those localities have grown largely in the past few years, and the influx of the islanders is asserted constantly to be increasing.

Those the islanders were allowed to dancing with white authorities struggled to prevent the outbreaks calm was again in- few days later by the of a Filipino pamphlet, title of "The Torch," said printed in Stockton and containing riot-breeding matter.

In the face of the growing seriousness of the situation William Locke-Padden, owner of the dancing club property where the first violence broke out, was induced to close the place. The dancing girls, factors of the first importance in the uprising, departed.

Other inflammatory manifestos continued to hamper the authorities. The climax came a few days ago when the offices of the Filipino Federation of America at Stockton were dynamited. The building was badly shattered, but none of the occupants was injured.

An investigation of the bombing proceeded and the authorities said they were inclined to believe disgruntled Filipinos at odds with the club faction took advantage of the conditions of unrest to blow the place down and perhaps leave the whites under suspicion, or else it was a "sympathy" bombing.

On the basis of those incidents, coupled with the ever-increasing Filipino population and the now-constant threat of recurrence of disorder, the question as to his extent in the United States; his economic and social adaptability; standards of living; his response to progress and his general attitude, as a race, toward the American scheme and principle, naturally faces the Filipino.

INFLUX FROM ISLAND

Best available statistics show approximately 65,000 or 70,000 Filipinos in the United States, of which about 50 per cent are in California. Most of these reside south of Sacramento. It is estimated that 15,000 are in Los Angeles and environs or have their headquarters here. They are generally youths from 15 to 30 years of age.

Sacramento and San Joaquin counties, particularly the latter, are also strongholds of the Filipinos. It is estimated that approximately 10,000 Filipinos, mostly men between 18 and 24, reside in Stockton. Sacramento and towns of the San Joaquin delta are increasing. The first great number of Filipinos came to the United States at the time of the World War when some 10,000 of them served in the armed forces, and on discharge did not return to the islands.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, last, 11,360 Filipinos entered the continental United States. Of this number 8689 came from the Philippines directly, 2654 came from Hawaii and seventeen entered from other points. Most of those entries landed at San Francisco and Seattle. It is significant that first violence occurred on the heels of the year of greatest entry of Filipinos.

FEW FEMALES OF OWN RACE

Among these thousands of insulars the ratio of Filipino women and girls is so small as to be almost negligible—perhaps five or ten women to each thousand men—and therein lies the principal social difficulty of the islander. He is denied the companionship of women of his race, and to seek companionship of that sex he is generally forced into the "taxi-dance halls" where white girls or others dance with him at an enormous percentage a dance.

Under that handicap the Filipino usually comes to the United States by the way of Hawaii—where he may have worked out a

PADRE TELLS METHODS OF FORECASTING

Father Ricard Explains How Sun Spots Affect Weather on Earth

BY HARRY CARR

Father Jerome Ricard, famous padre of the rains, whose illness is causing serious uneasiness to his legion of friends in all parts of the world, is a man of quaint and charming personality. One as far removed from the "cold scientific type" as could be imagined. Witty, without vanity, unmoved by praise or abuse—a stoop-shouldered little old peasant of French Provence—with the clear-eyed common sense and vision of his race.

Just before Christmas I spent a da, with him in his laboratory at Santa Clara College.

FOND OF HIS PIPE

While we talked he smoked a pipe. Like a naughty little boy, he asked me to see that the pipe didn't get into the picture. He said the archbishop somehow or other just didn't like to see him smoking a pipe. He got more fun out of that pipe than a boarding-school girl eating cake at a forbidden midnight supper.

He talked to me about his education for the Jesuit ordes of priesthood. I had heard that the course was terribly severe; and asked him about it.

"Didn't mind any of it," he said. "Except one subject—French. Never could learn French. That's a terrible language."

"But, padre, you are French yourself."

BORN IN PROVENCE

"Yes; French. I'm French. But I was born in Provence. That's different. We of Provence speak a dialect that is more like bad Latin than anything else. Real French is different. Whenever anybody sees me smoking a cigar and trying to talk French, you can know that I am just trying to show off."

I said that I supposed that he had spent his life studying sun spots. And that he had been, in a way, an explorer and discoverer in that research.

"Me? No-o-o-o. Up to 1900 I knew less about sun spots than the office cat. Didn't know a thing about sun spots. But a lot of other people did. Sun spots and weather prophecy were not new. There was once a famous astronomer who even tried to prophesy what the quotations of the wheat market would be by observing sun spots."

The padre chuckled.

SUN-SPOT THEORY

"When I began my work with sun spots and weather, most of the astronomers said I was a fool. Everybody has called me a fool at one time or another. You probably will before you get through writing about me."

He went on to explain what he brought to the scientific observation of sun spots.

It was this: that the sun is divided into a north zone and a south zone. These zones are swept by storms. These storms are caused by the position of the other planets in relation to the sun. When two or three planets get into a certain position, their magnetic powers

FITTS ELECTION TESTED IN SUIT

Registrar of Voters Seeks to Determine Status

Supervisor Wright's Place Also Involved in Case

Conflict Between State and County Law at Issue

The question of whether Dist.-Atty. Fitts and Supervisor Wright of the Fifth Supervisorial District have been legally holding office since their announced election at the primary of August 28, 1928, was placed before the State Supreme Court yesterday for adjudication.

The issue, which presents a prospective maze of legal and technical points affecting the entire system of county government, is raised by County Registrar of Voters Kerr, who filed a petition in the Supreme Court asking for an alternative writ of mandate to compel County Purchasing Agent Russell to buy an additional 500 ballot boxes for the county primary next August.

WHAT IT MEANS

Briefly, the suit provides a vehicle for a Supreme Court opinion on a discrepancy between the State constitution and the county charter in respect to elections.

Fitts and Wright both received majorities at the primary in August, 1928, and were issued certificates of election without the formality of having their names placed on the ballot at the general election in November, 1928.

The certificates were issued in conformity with the State's constitution section on elections but since Fitts and Wright took office under the certificates it has been pointed out that the county charter requires that their names should also have been placed on the ballot at the general election.

Because of this situation, a number of proponents of the county charter section on elections asserts that Fitts and Wright are not legally in office and therefore the ballot at the primary next August should carry the names of candidates who propose to run for the two offices on the assumption that they are legally vacant.

VIEWS OFFERED

Those on the other side of the controversy, however, assert that in cases weher the county charter may conflict with the State constitution the latter is always assumed to have precedence because it is constitutional law. Basing their opinion on this theory of the law, supporters of Fitts and Wright say they have been and are legally in office by virtue of the certificates issued them following the primary in August, 1928.

The question in this instance, however, has not been settled by the courts and it is for this reason that Kerr filed his suit yesterday to give the Supreme Court time to rule on the point before the ballots for the next primary are printed.

In this petition, Kerr necessarily takes the position that his duties are governed and regulated by the county charter and he states, therefore, that the certificates declaring Fitts and Wright elected following the 1928 primary were "mistakenly and illegally issued without regard to the provisions of the charter of Los Angeles county by reason of the provisions of the charter that the offices should have been filled at the general election."

Kerr states that he is "informed

The Lancer

by Harry Carr

THE ingredients of a new crime wave for Los Angeles are headed south. The roads are literally lousy with hobos.

If this hegira shows anything it shows the need of a State police force. As the situation now stands, the constables of each county shove the gang along into the next county.

Arrests are seldom made because an arrested hobo means expense to the county where he is jailed. Therefore the rural constables look the other way.

REIGN OF TERROR

I have been looking into this yegg business.

For years the tramp army has maintained a sort of reign of terror.

It began a quarter of a century ago in the days when the Miller & Lux ranches ran from one end of the State to the other.

So many crops and hay barns were set on fire by bums that the ranch owners established a settled policy to feed every tramp who asked for food. This resulted in a sort of chain of free hobo hotels. It is of record that some of the Miller & Lux ranches fed from forty to fifty yeggs a day throughout the season.

This naturally made California a hobo Garden of Eden—as it still is.

THE ARMY IN RAGS

For half an hour this morning I watched an almost continuous chain of tramps.

One was an old man with three hats on his head, two pairs of pants and two ragged old coats.

A jailer who had him in jail the other day told me that he was simply swarming with lice.

THE SICK YEGG

Another hobo was a very old man with a white beard and a big khaki-colored blanket roll. He had a wooden leg and hobbled his way painfully along. Every little while he sat down with a groan on his blankets in the middle of the road. He seemed to be in great pain. One of the constables told me they tried to get him into one of the county hospitals, but he ran away.

THE HIGHBROW

Another tramp who plodded through San Juan one day last week was a Harvard graduate. He has a son who is a prominent physician in Boston and a highbrow family. He told the consta-

Glab Murder Quiz May be Reopened With Arrest of McIntyre in Fatal Hit-and-Run Cras

MAN AND GIRL HELD IN CASE

Stenographer Tells How Auto Struck Two Women

Death Machine Abandoned With Plates Changed

Officers Examine Data on Druggist's Slaying

The Glab murder case, in which John R. Glab, wealthy retired druggist, was mysteriously shot to death on the front lawn of his home on Ventura Boulevard, June 18, 1928, may be reopened as the result of the arrest yesterday of W. R. McIntyre, former Los Angeles policeman, and another man and a girl on a manslaughter charge growing out of a hit-and-run accident New Year's Day.

RUBY BURROUGHS

McIntyre, at the time of the investigation into the murder of the druggist, was revealed as having been an intimate friend of Mrs. Hazel Glab, the widow. McIntyre and Mrs. Glab were held in technical custody for days during the investigation. Shortly after the murder had passed into the records as an unsolved crime, Mrs. Glab and McIntyre again came into the limelight when McIntyre was wounded in the neck from a gun which, he said, was in the hands of the woman.

HELD FOR FATAL CRASH

The shooting occurred in his apartment, but both McIntyre and the woman insisted the gun was discharged accidentally. They always have insisted they knew nothing that would aid in a solution of the case.

McIntyre's arrest yesterday followed a month's investigation of the death on January 1 of Mrs. Margaret Towers at Atlantic Boulevard and Hubbard street, by Capt. Bright, head of the Sheriff's homicide squad, and Deputies Vejar and Nettie Yaw. Booked with him were Miss Ruby Burroughs, a stenographer, and F. C. Simmons, president of the Pacific States Holding Company.

GIRL TELLS STORY

According to Capt. Bright, Simmons and the girl were booked because they are asserted to have aided McIntyre to cover up the accident in which Mrs. Towers was killed and her daughter, Mrs. John Gould, critically injured.

The story, as revealed by the investigation, according to Capt. Bright, involves Miss Burroughs as having accompanied McIntyre on the night of the accident and a statement to Deputy Sheriffs Vejar and Yaw. Simmons and Mrs. Simmons were involved as accessories after the fact.

W. R. McINTYRE

F. C. SIMMONS

According to Capt. Bright, Miss Burroughs told him that she and McIntyre had been drinking and after a quarrel in a cafe in Long Beach they started for Los Angeles.

denly his car shot forward as two women started across in front of it. He did not stop, although I urged him to, until we were about two blocks away. Then I crawled over the back of the front seat and took a bottle of whisky out of the pocket and poured it out. Then I threw the bottle into the vacant lot.

"I tried to get him to go back with me but he refused. I walked back to the crowd of people about the two women at the scene of the accident and then walked back to the automobile. We drove from there directly to the home of Mr. Simmons, my employer, at 814 Delaware Road, where McIntyre also lives. We told them about the accident and discussed the best way of covering it up.

PLATES SWITCHED

"The new license plates for McIntyre's car had arrived, so the men took the old ones off Simmons's machine and switched them for McIntyre's new ones. The old ones were put on McIntyre's machine. Then I got into the car with McIntyre and Mrs. Simmons got into their car with her husband and the two machines proceeded up into Laurel Canyon. A blind trail was followed away from the road and McIntyre's car was abandoned.

"Then McIntyre and I got into the Simmons's machine and we returned home."

Five days after this date Policeman Wilson of the Beverly Hills Police Department found the abandoned car. The facts were turned over to Capt. Bright.

Deputy Vejar Friday took a statement from the girl and then took McIntyre and Simmons into custody at the offices of the Pacific States Holding Company in the California Building. They were separated at the Sheriff's office and questioned.

McIntyre said he accompanied Simmons to San Diego on the day of the accident and did not return until two days later. Simmons denied he had been to San Diego with McIntyre.

ASKS FOR TRUTH

"I will not alibi any further for him," Simmons asserted. "I know nothing of the accident except what I have been told. I did not go to San Diego with McIntyre on the day of the accident."

Simmons, who has four children, was told that deputy sheriffs intended to question his wife. He was asked if he wanted to telephone her to tell the truth to the deputies and he replied in the affirmative. Accordingly, Simmons told her of his arrest and ended with:

"Tell the deputy sheriffs the entire truth."

He then was taken to jail. McIntyre refused to discuss the asserted confession of Miss Burroughs. He repeated that he had loaned his car to a man known to him as "George Wilson" on the day of the accident and had not seen the car since. He asserted he did not know "Wilson's" address.

He told the deputies that on January 21, last, he had reported his car stolen and had sworn out a warrant for "Wilson."

In the meantime Capt. Ray Cato of the Los Angeles police homicide squad heard of the arrest of McIntyre and he conferred with Capt. Bright over the possibilities of reopening the Glab murder investigation. Accordingly, all records were brought out and two city detectives and two deputy sheriffs were assigned to the new investigation.

draw in co-operation so to speak. This pull of their converging magnetic power causes storms on the sun—gusts of flaming gases.

AFFECT EARTH CURRENTS

The peculiarity that Father Ricard noticed was that the sun storms (sun spots) in the northern hemisphere of the sun always travel from west to east—like the hands of a clock. Traveling in the same direction as the earth travels, they start the earth currents going; these are our storms.

The sun storms of the southern hemisphere of the sun travel in the opposite direction—against the direction of clock hands. The magnetic power of these, being exerted upon the earth in the opposite direction to the motion of the earth, act as a brake upon the earth currents and cause fair weather.

"Then it would be possible to predict weather for years in advance?"

"Almost without limit. Our weather is a part of the illimitable system of the universe. By mathematics, we can predict the position of the planets in relation to the sun. From that we can predict sun storm. From the sun storms (or spots) we can foretell the earth storms. Or at least we will be able to one day."

"Then why do you sometimes guess wrong?"

"Because we do not, as yet, understand the magnetic power of the different planets. We know that sun spots have a certain effect. But we do not know about the effect of the moon, for instance. The moon has power enough to lift the weight of the sea waters six or seven feet and so make the tides. It must have a great influence on storm currents. What this is, we do not yet know.

"Another thing that we have not learned to foresee is the fact that storms get tired. This is of especial interest to you in Los Angeles. Storms develop in the Pacific near the Aleutian Islands. Some of them are apparently headed your way, but they just get tired and exhaust themselves before they get to Southern California—like any other traveler.

"If the weather depends upon the illimitable system of the universe and storms are arranged to drop into their places for hundreds of years ahead, what does it avail us to pray for rain?"

"I get your point," he said simply. "You mean that God would not change this whole interlocked system of the universe in answer to our pleas. That is true; but you overlook the fact that local storms—after they strike the earth—are influenced by small circumstances and special local conditions. God can alter these conditions without disturbing the vast machinery of creation. Prayers for rain are not in conflict with science."

TRAINS ASSISTANTS

The father sits in a cheerful little office in a straight-back chair by a window. The shelves of the room are filled with books on astronomy — government weather maps—tables of calculations from the Naval Observatory. But I saw no desk where he would do his mathematical calculations. He told me, in answer to a question, that he did very little of the actual figuring in these days. This work was so arduous and intense that his strength was no longer equal to it. He was training two young Jesuit priests to do the actual mathematics.

The father kept looking at his watch uneasily.

"Come on," he said, "got to get the time."

We walked through the long, clean new observatory to the front room, where he turned the key of a radio machine. We stood with our watches out.

The little sharp, faint clang of the hour of noon from the naval observatory. The padre glanced at his watch, then at the big chronometer. He smiled. Watch right, chronometer right, everything right.

and believes" that "divers persons" intend to present to him petitions naming them as candidates for the offices of District Attorney and Supervisor of the Fifth District and that the county charter will require that the names of these persons be placed on the ballot as candidates for the said offices at the primary next August.

Pursuant also to the charter, Kerr continues that he intends to receive and file such petitions and cause the names of the petitioners to be printed on the primary ballot as candidates for the offices in which Fitts and Wright have been serving.

With the filing of his petition in the Supreme Court, Kerr revealed that he had asked County Purchasing Agent Russell to buy an additional 500 ballot boxes to take care of the greater number of ballots that can be expected if the offices of District Attorney and Fifth Supervisorial District are voted on at the primary next August.

OPINIONS CONFLICT

"If we do not have candidates for those offices," said Kerr, "we have sufficient boxes now to take care of the ballots we can expect to be cast at the election. On the other hand, if the voters are asked to ballot on the offices of District Attorney and Supervisor for the Fifth District, we will have a much greater vote than ordinarily and will need the additional 500 boxes."

Purchasing Agent Russell, however, assumes in a letter to Kerr that Fitts and Wright were elected at the primary in August, 1928, and are legally in office by virtue of constitutional law. Acting on this theory, Russell recently refused Kerr's request for the 500 ballot boxes.

The boxes themselves would cost the county the nominal sum of $1500, but the question whether Kerr is entitled to have them provides the necessary means for a ruling by the Supreme Court on the discrepancy between the State Constitution and the county charter on the matter of elections.

REASON GIVEN

Kerr said yesterday he filed his petition in the Supreme Court, as it involves a question of such "great importance" to the people of the county and State that any decision in the case in a lower court would be appealed to the Supreme Court. Ordinary court procedure, it is pointed out, would not dispose of the question before the next primary and until the point is definitely settled there is probability of the recurrence of the problem.

Once the Supreme Court has given its opinion on the issue involved in Kerr's petition, Kerr can proceed to prepare and print the ballots for the primary next August, with the knowledge that he is proceeding legally, regardless of whether the State Constitution or county charter is upheld by the Supreme Court in the present case.

Frank B. Belcher appears as Kerr's attorney.

Dist. Atty. Fitts said last night he is not greatly concerned over the question of the legality of his election raised by County Registrar of Voters Kerr.

"I feel that the election was a legal one and of course my office will defend that stand before the Supreme Court," he said last night.

The district attorney also declared that although Kerr had named only the district attorney and Supervisor Wright, Supervisors Shaw and McCullen will later be involved in the same action, as their election was achieved in the same manner.

INCREASE IN VOTERS SHOWN

Total of 341,864 Registered in County During January, With Republicans Far in Lead

Voting strength has nearly doubled during the past two years, it was revealed yesterday on the face of registration totals for January, made public by Registrar of Voters W. M. Kerr of Los Angeles county. In this county 341,864 voters were registered last month as compared with 183,329 registered during January, 1928.

Classified as to political party adherence, the total registered since January 2, last, is as follows: In the county, Republican, 229,264, Democratic 72,402, Socialist 1988, Prohibition 4986, declined to state 33,861, miscellaneous 360. Of these, the voters registered in the city were: Republican 120,945, Democratic 39,438, Socialist 1143, Prohibition 1763, declined to state 18,739, miscellaneous 146.

Comparison with the party affiliations declared in the January, 1928, registration shows gains for all parties excepting the Prohibition in the city, which dropped from 3917 to 1763.

Registration will continue until October 4 for the November elections. Voters wishing to participate in the August primaries must register before or by July 26. Registrar Kerr announced:

"During this month the registration deputies will be visiting some of the large industrial plants, office buildings, etc., to register the employees. If any other large concerns, clubs or civic organizations desire to have their employees registered, they should make their request in writing to the Registrar of Voters who will be glad to make arrangements for their registration."

CHIEF SCOTT GOING EAST TO CONFERENCE

Ralph J. Scott, Fire Chief of Los Angeles and president of the International Association of Fire Chiefs, will leave here Tuesday over the Union Pacific system for Winnipeg, Can., and New York, to attend the executive sessions of the association.

He will be accompanied by Chief J. W. Stephens of the San Francisco fire department on the trip. Scott was just recently elected head of the international association.

Style-Merchandise

from the nearest source

THE whole science of Merchandising, these days, pivots on the idea of Speed! Buying demands change so rapidly that goods wanted today, may be dead stock tomorrow. The successful store is the live store, where lines of Style-Merchandise are constantly renewed, and where slow sellers never accumulate.

Merchandise-inventories have come to be vitally important. Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, recently pointed out that this was not so much a matter of totals, as of comparison between saleable and unsaleable lines. A large proportion of bankruptcies, he added, were among stores which either kept no inventories, or failed to understand their significance.

The live inventory represents goods that your people want today, in quantities which will be gone tomorrow; to be replaced with something newer the next day. You cannot better define "Style-Merchandise." You cannot name a factor which means more to your success as a retailer.

And you cannot possibly take full advantage of this factor unless your buying connections are such that a steady flow of stock-replacements moves to your store in terms of hours, rather than of days.

Whether your business is a matter of thousands, or of millions, it would pay you to buy in St. Louis. It is your nearest big wholesale market. It is a manufacturing market. It has the fastest, most direct, and most dependable Package Car Service. It has the resources to meet your needs.

And its business men are men who know your market and are interested in serving it well.

...Moncado is keenly sensible to the ...effects of the "taxi-dance" hall on ...the Filipino, and resents them, even ...as he deplores the spread of radical and un-American ideas among ...the youths for their subjection to ...Communism as a mass.

"These boys have come to the United States," Moncado says, "as their land of promise. Here they find a freedom, bewildering at first but as the pendulum swings back they accept it in all its fullness and without restraining responsibility they are inclined to stray wide afield."

Pablo Manlapit, an official of the Philippine Chamber of Commerce and publisher of a Filipino newspaper, who is of more radical expression, believes the racial discord a "great conspiracy" to influence Congress to provide amendments sufficient to restrict Filipino immigration.

RECOGNIZED AS LEADERS

Moncado and Manlapit are generally understood to represent the two extremes of Filipino leadership locally, and their respective followings in some quarters have come to be known as the "purist" and "liberal" factions. Despite the factions among the Filipinos they are clannish as to themselves and are possessed of a staunch racial solidarity without national consciousness.

The Filipinos of the average type found in the "taxi dance halls" and poolrooms, which seem to constitute their chief diversions, are not noticeably aggressive nor progressive; their temperaments appear sluggish as to assimilation into an economic scheme or enlargement of their scope, and it is chiefly their primal impulses that arouse more turbulent natures.

THE BIT AND BRIDLE

Under those conditions naturally the Filipinos' standard of living cannot be one of the highest order. In rooming-houses in their district they gather in groups for habitation and sleep in one room; their meals are eaten in small lunch rooms; they are without home life, except those very few who are married, and when they have done with their daily job they patronize dance halls or poolrooms or remain on the streets.

The Filipinos seldom figure in major crime, according to police records, and their sole dispute with the law goes back at once to their dance hall proclivities. They are arrested often on violations of the morals ordinances and for dealing in illicit liquor. Their clannishness extends against police investigations and there are practically no "stool pigeons" among them.

So it goes with the Filipino in America. He is bewildered by the broad freedom he finds on the continent and permits intoxication by it to false complexes; averse to arts and craftsmanship, he fails of an economic and industrial status; denied the companionship of women of his race, he heeds not the danger of the mercenary; without proper leadership he is a dupe to Communism; failing of economic status, he is unable to raise his standard of living, and in general befuddlement at an intricate civilization he blindly seeks bit and bridle for the problems of his race.

FILIPINO CRITICISES MANILA MEETING

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—While authorities in various Central and Northern California cities and towns took steps today to prevent trouble at dance halls and recreation centers frequented by Filipinos, sharp criticism of tomorrow's scheduled Filipino mass meeting in Manila was voiced by Manuel M. Insigne, general secretary-treasurer of the Philippine Civic League of San Francisco, Chicago and New York.

Authorities in Modesto, Newman, Patterson, Turlock and other towns in the vicinity today issued orders barring Filipinos from the Saturday night dances.

At Watsonville boxing shows have been suspended indefinitely to prevent mixed gatherings.

Fresno police, according to reports from there, were given orders to break up groupings of Filipinos at the slightest indication of trouble.

Stockton was reported normal with Filipino workers still arriving for the forthcoming asparagus cutting.

HERE'S HOW UKULELES START OUT

Valuable Koa Shipment Arrives From Hawaiian Islands

Great Logs Dwarf Mere Man

Mate H. J. Timmers of liner City of Honolulu poses with nine pieces of koa weighing twenty-two tons and worth king's ransom.

NINE logs of koa wood, totaling twenty-two tons and valued at the proverbial king's ransom, attracted much attention at the harbor yesterday when they were discharged from the Lasco liner City of Honolulu.

Koa wood is the native Hawaiian wood from which ukuleles are made and it is extensively used in the islands for valuable furniture. It is little known on the United States mainland because of the expense of transporting it across the Pacific.

The logs arriving yesterday are consigned to an Indianapolis addressee and it is assumed that they are to be made into musical instruments or expensive furniture.

KEYES WILL GO TO HIGH COURT

Counsel to Plan Rehearing Petition Tomorrow

Appeal to Supreme Tribunal Will Then Remain

Lawyers Declare He Will be Eligible for Parole

Counsel for Asa Keyes, former District Attorney convicted with Ed H Rosenberg of bribery conspiracy and whose appeal was denied by the Appellate Court, will begin tomorrow their last desperate efforts to keep their clients out of San Quentin penitentiary.

With only a petition for rehearing in the Appellate Court, which, if denied may be followed by a like petition to the Supreme Court of California, left between Keyes and Rosenberg and from one to fourteen years in prison, both of the prisoners will learn their fate within thirty days.

Defense Counsel Le Compte Davis for Rosenberg and Paul W. Schenck and Milton Cohen for Keyes announced yesterday morning that a conference will be held tomorrow to discuss the decision handed down Friday by the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Two.

INNOCENCE REITERATED

Out of the defense conference will come the future action of Keyes and Rosenberg which, according to Davis, will probably consist of the two legal moves which remain to them. Both of the men from their cells in the County Jail announced yesterday that a "fight to the finish" will be carried on by them through their counsel.

Yesterday both Keyes and Rosenberg seemed to have resigned themselves to the knowledge of the very slim chance left for freedom and declared that they would not go to the penitentiary until the last legal recourse is exhausted.

"If I have to go to prison," declared Keyes yesterday, "I will go with the full knowledge that I am the victim of others and that I am not guilty of the crime of which I have been convicted."

"I am going to fight as long as I can," declared Rosenberg, "and if in the long run I am beaten then I will go to the penitentiary with a smile and will come out the same way. I can do this because I have done no wrong and in my own heart know that I have been convicted for a crime I never committed."

VICTORY FOR FITTS

On the other hand members of the District Attorney's office yesterday hailed the decision of the higher court as a complete victory for Dist.-Atty. Fitts who handled the prosecution of the case and stated that the opinion points out that there was sufficient evidence presented to the jury to justify the verdict.

According to the laws of California, Keyes, convicted of bribery while a public official, is not entitled to probation but must do what ever portion of his sentence of from one to fourteen years is fixed by the prison board.

However, counsel claimed yesterday that he is entitled to parole the same as any other prisoner and that if he loses his last battle for freedom the same rules and regulations governing any other prisoner in San Quenein will apply to his case.

Under Keyes's sentence he will appear before the prison board after serving one full year and at that time his sentence will be fixed. Following that he could be paroled after having served half of his time if the prison board sees fit. Also two months off for good time may be credited to Keyes each year for the first two years, four months for the next two years and five months off for each of the next six years.

The same rules and regulations apply to Rosenberg who has never requested probation and now may only look forward to a possible early parole.

HAYNES QUITS WATER BODY

Whitsett Also to Resign in Line With New Policy Established by Porter

Dr. John R. Haynes, president of the Board of Water and Power Commissioners, yesterday notified Mayor Porter that he has mailed his resignation as a Los Angeles member of the board of directors to the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California. W. H. Whitsett, chairman of the water district board, will resign this week as a member of the Board of Water and Power Commissioners.

These resignations, which divorce entirely the personnel of the water and power board and the water district board, are in line with the policy expressed some days ago by Mayor Porter, who feels that it will bring about additional harmony between Los Angeles and the ten smaller cities which make up the water district.

The matter was discussed some weeks ago by the Mayor and the commissioners. At that time Mr. Whitsett readily agreed to the program, but Commissioner Haynes was hesitant. Commissioner Haynes's term on the city board expires next July 1.

Yesterday morning Mayor Porter conferred with Mr. Whitsett and W. B. Mathews, special counsel for the Department of Water and Power, both of whom attended the Colorado River conference at Reno. Shortly thereafter he announced that Dr. Haynes had notified him by telephone that the resignation was being forwarded. Mr. Whitsett's resignation will be effective some time next week, when his successor will be nominated.

Mayor Porter also discussed the Colorado River problems with Councilman Jacobson and O. T. Johnson, Jr., water district board member, who attended the conference.

"Our representatives at the conference feel encouraged," Mayor Porter said.

Truck Victim Identified as Mission Worker

A man believed to have been Albert S. Peck, about 55 years of age, formerly of Oakland, was killed instantly yesterday when he either fell or jumped beneath the wheels of a heavy truck at Sunset Boulevard and Hill street. The driver, Ted Rose, 26 years of age, of 457 Museum Drive, told police his first knowledge of what had occurred came when he saw the victim's hat rolling away from the truck.

Credentials found in the dead man's pocket showed he was employed as solicitor for the Christian Mission and Industrial Association, 112 1-2 Weller street. The truck driver was not held.

U.C. ALUMNI NOMINATE ANGELENO

Samuel M. Haskins Named for Presidency at Annual Committee Meeting

Samuel M. Haskins, Los Angeles attorney, has been nominated as president of the University of California Alumni Association for the coming year, it was revealed yesterday when results of the annual meeting of the association's nominating committee were made public in Berkeley.

Haskins's name, along with those of the other officers chosen, will be submitted for ratification to the 24,000 members of the association. Election and installation will take place May 14.

The presidency carries with it a place on the University Board of Regents. In addition, the new president will take a leading part in the efforts of the association to raise a $1,000,000 endowment fund. The retiring president is Everett E. Brown of Oakland.

Other officers nominated are Warren Olney, San Francisco attorney and former State Supreme Court justice, first vice-president; Mrs. Alexander F. Morrison, San Francisco philanthropist, second vice-president, and Luther Nichols, assistant comptroller of the university, treasurer.

W. B. Storey, president of the Santa Fe Railroad, was chosen to head the board of counsellors for a two-year term. Other counsellors nominated were Paul Sinsheimer, San Francisco financier; T. M. Putnam, dean of men at the University of California; Ned Marr of the University of California at Los Angeles, and Chaffee E. Hall, San Francisco attorney.

Body Identified by Rent Receipt

A rent receipt found in his pockets yesterday identified the body of a supposed suicide as Cassius Dooley, 50 years of age, of 914 North Benton Way. He had registered at a hotel at 617 West Fifth street as Sam Doolan and police learned that his widow is Mrs. C. M. Dooley.

He left no farewell note and the widow said she can assign no reason for his act. Death was caused by a bullet wound self-inflicted in the temple.

BOLTON GIVEN LIFE SENTENCE

John Dewey Bolton, Jr., former dance-hall operator convicted of first-degree murder in connection with the death last November of his wife Lucille, yesterday was sentenced to life imprisonment in San Quentin penitentiary.

Sentence was imposed after Superior Judge Wilson denied a motion for a new trial. Bolton served oral notice of appeal to the District Court of Appeal.

Bolton is asserted to have shot his wife while they were in an automobile on the Roosevelt Highway north of Santa Monica. As a motive for the crime, the State charged the former dance-hall operator with plotting to collect $10,000 insurance on the life of Mrs. Bolton.

Following court proceedings yesterday, Attorney Newton J. Kendall announced his withdrawal as Bolton's attorney. It is said Bolton has entered negotiations with his mother and sister, now in Florida, to arrange for the employment of counsel to perfect his appeal.

Bad laws, if they exist, should be repealed as soon as possible; still, while they continue in force, for the sake of example, they should be religiously observed.

Today's Bible Text

The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common.—Acts iv:32.

PASSING THE BUCK

The Duke of Alba declines to substitute for Primo de Rivera. There is no particular fun in being a dictator even if there is a line-up of those ready to take dictation. It is a job, and a duke doesn't have to work.

THE BIG SETTLEMENT

The statesmen were right. No nation is wholly pleased with the Young plan of international settlements, but that proves its worth. It was vital that all governments should make some concessions. Having done so the program will proceed with the least possible hardship to everybody.

SOME PARSNIPS

One of our ranchers dashes up to the Hall of Fame bearing a parsnip seventy-six inches long and weighing thirteen pounds. We can't think of anyone craving a six-foot parsnip, but if such there be, here it is. First thing we know some agronomist will butt into the picture with a crop of spinach that has to be harvested with an ax.

STRONG ENFORCEMENT

President Hoover is mentioned as being keenly alive to the problems of law enforcement and it may be expected that the most practical possible use of the government machinery will be devoted to standardizing the Eighteenth Amendment. It is not expected that the armies and navies will be called into action, but a sensible use of all the legal apparatus at hand will be made.

IMITATED SANTA CLAUS

In a Pennsylvania city a sailor turned burglar figured that he could gain easy access to a home by the Santa Claus route—down the chimney. But it was not to be. He got wedged in the brickwork and his cries finally attracted the attention not only of the family, but the neighbors. It took not only the police, but the fire department to pry him from his moorings and it is suspected that his career as a burglar will be halted for quite some time. Anyhow, he got off to a bad start.

CAUSE OF TEMPERANCE

The Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society winds up its affairs. Having put the amendment across it is figured that there is no further warrant for the existence of the organization. But there was nearly $50,000 left in the treasury. This is quite a wad for any society to have in its coffers. The members might have had a swell banquet and made whoopee, but instead of that they turned over the dough to the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which is still continuing business at the old stand. The money will adhere to its mission.

STEADYING DOWN

It is mentioned that in the last nineteen years there have been nineteen revolutionary movements in Mexico. Of these fifteen were miserable failures. The other four were successful and explain various changes in the government. An unsuccessful revolution in Mexico is the most abject and useless of things—in fact, it is a complete dud. But the cactus republic is becoming nicely stabilized. Education is general and the people are all going to work. Mexico is destined to be a wonderful country. It has resources to astonish the world.

GHOSTLY APPLAUSE

Congressman Underhill of Massachusetts seeks to rip precedent up the back. He has offered a resolution which would take the word "applause" out of the Congressional Record. This word has been permitted to run at large since the first issue of the publication. Representatives who never make speeches, but are "given leave to print," embellish their alleged remarks with frequent notations of applause. They mark it in when the proofs are corrected. The newspapers of the country abandoned their bracketed applause in reporting speeches a generation ago. To bring it in when no speech was really made and no applause given is to offer the silliest sort of a stuffed-shirt parade.

KEYES CONVICTION AFFIRMED

The decision of the Second District Court of Appeal upholding the conviction of Asa Keyes and E. H. Rosenberg on a charge of criminal conspiracy to give and receive bribes is something of a milestone in California. Not only does it declare that Keyes, Rosenberg and Ben Getzoff, who was convicted with them, were fairly tried and that there was ample evidence of their guilt; but it decides an important, though technical, point of law about which grave doubts had been expressed by good lawyers, in and out of the case. Since the decision is unanimous, the probability of its failure to stand in the Supreme Court is not great.

Keyes announces he will "fight on" till the last court has had its say in the matter, which, of course, is his right. It is also his privilege to remain in the County Jail pending appeal. But if his conviction is finally affirmed, the time spent in jail will not be deducted from his prison service. He has already been in jail nearly a year, since the date when the fateful verdict was returned against him was February 8, 1929.

The court's decision in the case is almost unique in that contentions of the defense are not upheld in a single particular; upon every point the trial judge, Judge Butler, is upheld in his rulings.

The point of law upon which the case principally hinged was whether the defendants should have been charged with conspiracy, or directly with the crime of bribery. Substantially, the court holds that this is immaterial in California, since conspiracy to commit the crime and the crime itself carry the same penalty. In some other jurisdictions, particularly in the Federal courts, the court points out, the rule has been laid down that where a crime has been committed, the participants may not be placed on trial for conspiracy to commit it, but must be tried on the direct charge. Where this rule holds the penalties are different, and there is no reason for it here. The decision amounts to saying that the District Attorney may elect, in any case where two or more defendants are involved, to try them directly for committing crime or for conspiracy to commit it.

This puts a powerful weapon at the disposal of prosecuting officers, permitting them to bring whichever charge is most easily proved.

Keyes, who then was District Attorney; Rosenberg, Getzoff, his son, Dave; Jacob Berman (alias Jack Bennett,) Charles Reimer and Jack Rosenberg were indicted late in 1928 on the conspiracy charges, it being asserted that Keyes had accepted money, automobiles, a radio and various other gifts to "go easy" on the various defendants charged with wrecking the Julian Petroleum Corporation through overissue of stock. The case was dismissed as to Jack Rosenberg, Dave Getzoff and Reimer for lack of evidence against them, and as to Berman because he turned State's evidence and testified against his fellow-conspirators. In the trial, which lasted several weeks, an amazing story of how justice was bought and sold in the Spring-street tailor shop of Ben Getzoff was related, in part by Berman, in part by tailors before whom the defendants had been incautious enough to discuss their affairs, and in part by salesmen who supplied the gifts with which Keyes was plied.

Keyes denied the money bribes outright, but admitted receiving the gifts, which he declared were free-will, friendly offerings from Getzoff, whom he had believed very wealthy. That, substantially, was his defense to the charges. He declared he had prosecuted the Julian defendants to the best of his ability and that it was no fault of his that all were acquitted.

The jury found Keyes, E. H. Rosenberg and Ben Getzoff guilty as charged. Getzoff threw himself on the mercy of the court and received probation, subsequently testifying for the State in other bribery cases. Keyes and Rosenberg were sentenced to one to fourteen years each in San Quentin, and appealed.

The conviction of Keyes and the other defendants brought to an end a scandalous condition in the District Attorney's office of the State's most important county; and its affirmation gives proof to the world that the perversion of justice is considered, in California, as grave a crime as it deserves to be. It also proves that the courts are potent to deal with crime wherever it may be found, and whoever may commit it.

Citizens of California give thanks today for the integrity which brought this heinous conspiracy to the bar of justice and there meted out to it the punishment which the law prescribes.

THE WET-DRY DEBATE

In the fifty years that the liquor question was debated before the adoption of the prohibition amendment, about all the arguments that conceivably could be used on either side were given an airing. Ten years of prohibition have not served to abate the vociferousness. It is not likely, therefore, that the debate set for February 12 before the House Judiciary Committee will bring forth anything new. It has all been said, over and over and over, and the only result has been to increase the prohibition majorities both in the Senate and House. The opinion of no legislator, and the opinions of few if any citizens, are going to be changed by this additional discussion. But aside from its futility, there appears no great objection to the wets having a further say.

If there is any new information about prohibition, it is more likely to be brought forth by the Wickersham committee when that body makes its final report, and it would seem the part of wisdom to wait until that report is at hand with its summary of found facts. The preliminary report was restricted to ways and means of improving enforcement, and did not touch the academic question of the desirability of prohibition. The final report may not do so; the commission is likely to take the attitude of the country at large, which is that the wisdom of the course is no longer debatable and prohibition, in law, is established and irreversible.

Congress might as well waste time this way as in some of its other ways. It has a lot of important matters before it, but there is little probability that these would be speeded up in any event.

Seven resolutions to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment are before the committee and it is on these that the major debate will center, despite the fact that everybody knows they have not a ghost of a chance of being reported, of passing Congress or of being adopted by three-fourths of the States. There also will be hearings on Congressman Dyer's 2.75 per cent beer bill, which will not pass either and which would not put bootleggers out of business if it did.

This talk of solving all prohibition problems with 2.75 per cent beer is particular nonsense. The alcoholic thirst of those who still have a thirst for alcohol is not going to be quenched with such a beverage. Bootleggers deal in the high-power stuff the thirsty want and will continue to do so when uncaught and unpunished, and until enough are caught and punished to make the bootlegging business unprofitable. The bootleggers would still have to be prevented from selling goods of higher alcoholic content than 2.75 per cent, and the only effect of permitting 2.75 per cent beer would be to make the pursuit of bootleggers more difficult.

The declaration of former Police Chief Davis that the antiliquor laws can be enforced 98 per cent within a year through 100 per cent co-operation of law-enforcement agencies is interesting on this point. It is the studied judgment not of an impractical theorist, but of a man with years of practical experience. Too much liberality by the courts and neglect to use vigorously the abatement weapon are at the bottom of prohibition failure, so far as there has been failure, in his opinion.

In other words, prohibition can be enforced, could be, and will be, and the Congressmen who insist that it cannot do not know what they are talking about. No law will have 100 per cent observance, but when we have the 98 per cent Davis speaks of conditions will be materially improved.

HELP WANTED

Uncle Sam's forest service is very good as far as it goes, but it cannot cover the ground. That is one reason why timber and brush fires in the national parks are able to do so much damage. According to the annual report the personnel of the service is such as to permit but one guard to an average of 28,000 acres of the great domain. Any ranger would need keen eyesight to keep watch and ward over forty-four square miles of land. Our parks are yearly becoming more and more popular and their care and preservation likewise grow more vital.

IN THE FIELD

Not alone by her fruits is California known. It is found that the value of the field crops of the State last year considerably exceeded $200,000,000. This was mainly hay and grain, but there were various other items to round out an impressive whole. Incidentally cotton has become a highly important factor in the welfare of California.

NO CHEERING

Among the prospective industries over which there is no gloating in the community is the promise of a dustless, noiseless and odorless cement plant in the Beverly Hills district. The neighbors do not seem able to work up a bit of enthusiasm over the idea.

The LEE SIDE O' LA

BY Lee Shippey

Personal Glimpses of Famous Southlanders

IN HIS office downtown he looks like a business executive, though younger and less marked by worry and hardship than most business executives of his age. And when you shake hands you learn that he is firmer of grip, too. Though he looks as if he might have led a sheltered life there is nothing soft about him. There is decision in his face and his clear eyes don't miss details as he looks at you. He is rather less than medium height, but well-knit and fit. And his voice is so low that you have to give close attention.

But probably there is no other man so worthy of the mantle of Kit Carson, and even Carson never had such a varied and romantic career as Frederick Russell Burnham has had. Twenty-three years ago Richard Harding Davis, in his "Real Soldiers of Fortune," wrote of him as the greatest of living scouts. He not only had proved himself a great scout in the Indian wars of the American Southwest, but the greatest Africa ever knew, so that Cecil Rhodes gave him friendship and admiration, the English government gave him 100 square miles of land and—King Edward gave him the Distinguished Service Cross. And now, in his sixty-ninth year, he is just back from another exploring trip to Africa.

And he has done everything a romantic boy dreams of doing—been a cowboy, a punisher of desperadoes, a finder of gold mines, a hero on two continents, a discoverer of buried treasure, a discoverer of prehistoric ruins and the author of a great book, "Scouting on Two Continents."

When This Was "Queen of Cow Counties"

Some of Burnham's ancestors were with Wolfe in Canada, others were of the pioneer stock which pushed out from Virginia to Kentucky and then to Missouri in the days of Boone and Crockett. He was born on an Indian reservation in Minnesota in 1861 and came with his family to Los Angeles when he was 9 years old. When he was 12 his father died and the family went to Clinton, Iowa, but the adventurous lad felt capable of making his own way. Los Angeles then was "the Queen of the Cow Counties," surrounded by far-flung cattle ranches, so big that in summer the cattle could be driven back into the mountains for forage, and there was not a fence or a gate between Los Angeles and San Francisco. In one dry year, about '73, grass and water were so precious that to keep all the cattle from starving to death vaqueros rounded up a herd of 20,000 wild horses near Capistrano and with red shawls waving to frighten them stampeded them over a cliff into the sea. Young Burnham could ride anything, and shoot like a man, and could earn his way herding cattle. But he loved the woods and the mountains, loved to ride off by himself into silent places and track deer, often being alone in the hills two or three days. Once while he was doing that he returned to his camp from a scouting trip to find his horse was stolen. He tracked the bandit, intending to shoot him, but on foot could not catch him. Later he learned that he had been tracking the famous killer, Vasquez.

Only One Year of School

Then Burnham's only schoolbooks were running brooks and tracks and trails. At 14 he realized that he must get some schooling and went to an uncle in Clinton, Iowa. In that staid and virtuous town it was considered a great sin for boys to play on Sunday, or show much levity on any day. So the youth from the wild West played havoc with the rising generation's morale. He organized a secret tribe which built canoes and had caves and got the whole town so excited that everyone agreed young Burnham needed a strong controlling hand or he'd surely land in jail and take all their little angels along with him. That is, all agreed he was a bad boy except a little girl named Blanche Blick, who liked him better than all the goody-goody boys in town.

But he knew she couldn't prevent the community from banding to subjugate him. So one dark night he got into his canoe and floated away down the Mississippi River—after only one year of schooling. But he loved to read the stories of great men.

Made Dreams Come True

He adventured gayly through Missouri, Texas, New Mexico and Arizona and, through friendship, was drawn into one famous Arizona feud in which many men were killed and his own life often was in danger. He was pursued by gunmen who wanted to make it impossible for him to testify in court. He often had to change horses, clothes, shoes and even his name. But he realized that "all life worth living is based on property, and property depends on law," and allied himself with the forces of law and order. When the Apaches took the warpath he rendered valuable service to the government and after that went out into the desert and discovered a gold mine.

So in 1884 he was able to buy an orange ranch in Pasadena and go back to Clinton for his boyhood sweetheart, making another boyhood dream come true.

The Call of Africa

Burnham's life had brought him in touch with all the adventurous spirits of the West, and in the early '90's those men were talking about Africa and Cecil Rhodes. "That's the man for me," Burnham decided—as he wasn't a successful orange grower—and set off for Africa. In 1893 he landed there, and after buying pack animals had only $50 left. But he knew scouting and the ways of savages. He made himself so valuable that his exploits became matters of history. In the Matabele war, for example, he was commanded to capture or kill the Matabele god, Umline, in whom the natives had such fanatical faith that they could not be conquered while he was free. Burnham tracked him into a cave and killed him.

American Chief of British Scouts

He returned to America only to get restless again and tried gold mining in the Klondike. But Lord Roberts sent for him in 1900 and made him chief of the British scouts in the field in the Boer War. He was wounded in 1901 while destroying an enemy railway base and invalided home. On arrival in England he was commanded to dine with Queen Victoria and later was created member of the Distinguished Service Order by King Edward, who also presented him with the South African medal and the D. S. O. cross.

But in 1902 Burnham was back in Africa, as an explorer. If Rhodes was the empire builder, Burnham was the empire finder, exploring vast areas never before charted. He found a lake of carbonate of soda and prehistoric ruins in which there was treasure of gold. And in 1908 he was down in Mexico, making discoveries of great archeological and commercal value.

It's no use. We can't tell even one-twentieth the story. But the one thing which sticks in our mind is that he is a quiet, courteous, unassuming man you might take for a head bookkeeper—if you didn't notice how firm his hands and mouth are.

THE WEEK IN POLITICS

BY KYLE D. PALMER

In ancient times, when payers of taxes began to grumble too insistently, when the people grew restless and full of complaint, when smiles and cheers gave place to frowns and sneers, the rulers either cut off the recalcitrant heads or sought to ameliorate conditions by staging fiestas, pageants and lavish displays to sweeten the popular temper.

The first method has fallen more or less into disrepute and, anyway, history shows that the second method, even as the mollified grumblers realized the deception, proved reasonably successful.

Hence, in modern times, especially in modern California, we have Governor's conferences to dispel public dissatisfaction.

Imagine, if you please, the striking difference that exists in this State between an election year and a nonelection year. Last year, and the year before, being nonelection years, there were no Governor's conferences. But by dint of much lobbying in the last Legislature and much planning by skillful politicians, Governor's conferences and an election year fall happily and apparently without premeditation within the same year.

Furthermore, the first Governor's conference—"taking the government to the people"—occurs by some strange series of coincidences right in the midst of the one California region where Governor's conferences are presumed to be needed most—Southern California.

It is astounding.

There is much pomp and circumstance and a review or two of motorcycle officers in shiny uniforms, and the conference is off in full blast, with photographers' flashlights popping and solemn conferees solemnly conferring and making speeches and coughing a little by reason of the acrid fumes of the flashlights.

But never smiling to spoil the dignity of the occasion, and looking serious and responsible and keenly concerned with the people's troubles, as—it is to be presumed—is most befitting a Governor's conference when the Governor is seeking re-election and facing many of those problems that make the best of Governors confer.

It goes without saying that the next Governor's conference will be held in Northern California and right speedily, it seems, because the cynical and carping character of Northern California comments on the flattery and affection bestowed by the first Governor's conference upon Southern California is sufficient to alarm almost the hardiest political manager—not even to mention Gov. Young.

One needs a certain amount of background properly to understand the significance and importance of Governor's conferences. There have been in the past in this State other such phenomena, but called by other and, perhaps, less imposing names.

The reason has at all times been the same—recognition of the large size of Southern California's vote, and coincidental realization of the necessity for capturing a measurable share of that vote in order to avert political oblivion. It is a sort of cycle—indifference for two or three years, then, as election nears, great activity, cajolery, expenditure of funds, hectic concern about matters which would be better served by more consistent and less sporadic attention.

Votes have been snared thus in many places, by many persons and under many divergent conditions. No one may logically blame Gov. Young and those who confer with him for utilizing a formula that has proved tried and true. Occasionally something happens and the plan does not work. This year is as good as another for giving it further test.

The gubernatorial election in prospect is perplexing and by no means susceptible of easy analysis.

Those who may be termed reasonably formidable candidates for the Republican nomination now include Gov. Young, State Controller Riley, Dist.-Atty. Fitts, Mayor Rolph of San Francisco and, possibly, former Gov. Richardson.

In maneuvering for favorable position all of the foregoing are maintaining an attitude of mutual politeness in which the principal if not sole jarring note is a pardonable degree of difference of opinion concerning the relative qualifications of all concerned.

Gov. Young, for example, says Riley and Fitts may, for all he knows to the contrary, be excellent examples of official efficiency in their respective offices, and the harassed Governor seems to feel that neither Fitts nor Riley should attempt to unseat a Governor as good as Gov. Young indicates is a fact in his case.

Riley entertains publicly confessed admiration for Fitts as a District Attorney and even goes so far as to say that Fitts is a man of pleasing personality. Here his confidence seems to end. The State Controller very obviously entertains a conviction that he will make a better Governor than Fitts. The same conviction in Riley's bosom applies to Young.

Then take the District Attorney of this county. He thinks Mr. Young may be credited with good intention and he has a positive liking for Mr. Riley. But here he, too, comes to a parting of the ways and refuses to permit personal feelings to stand in the way of political conviction. Mr. Fitts wants no one to misunderstand the fact that he has, after looking the matter over with care, decided that the Governorship will be in better hands if his are the hands.

Mayor Rolph advances the genial and politically simple suggestion that he will be a candidate if a sufficient number of his friends urge him to enter the race. A somewhat naive pronouncement from a figure as indelibly associated with practical politics as "Sunny Jim," but having its merits nevertheless. Sometimes a mere whisper in a politician's ear can be interpreted by him as a mighty roar of public acclaim. We shall see.

Former Gov. Richardson has far more political acumen than some of his political opponents—and many of his political friends—concede him. He indicated some time ago that Fitts might be a wise choice. He has not exactly receded from that position and may take it up vigorously at any time. Pending developments, however, he chooses to wait. There are a few political observers who believe Richardson may "choose to run."

In any event, and regardless of the personnel that eventually makes up the list of aspirants for the Republican gubernatorial nomination, Rolph will be a factor to be reckoned with. He is the best campaigner of the lot and will, without doubt, get a large vote from the wets of California. There are other complications.

This writer doubts that, when the list is closed two or three months hence, Fitts, Riley, Young, Richardson and Rolph will all file their nominating petitions. It is far more likely that the number of actual contenders will be reduced to three; possibly two.

Should Rolph remain, of course, there will be at least three.

For a possible view of future possibilities it is well to look at the events of former elections. Twelve years ago, Rolph was a candidate for Governor. In that election there were—or were thought to be—three several formidable contenders both for the Republican and the Democratic nominations.

The candidates were: W. D. Stephens, serving by appointment as Governor and seeking election as the heir and the political figurehead, more or less, of the Hiram Johnson-Alexander political machine; Mayor Rolph, Francis J. Heney, Walter Bordwell, Charles M. Fickert, J. O. Hayes, C. A. A. McGee, Thomas Lee Woolwine, Henry H. Roser.

According to political party affiliation they were divided as follows:

Republican: Stephens, Rolph, Bordwell, Hayes, Fickert.

Democrat: Woolwine, Heney.

Socialist: Henry H. Roser.

However, due to the somewhat irresponsible and desultory character of California's preferential primary law, the candidates mentioned not only filed nominating petitions with their own party affiliations, but entered contests for other party nominations, including the Progressive and Prohibition parties.

The result was astonishing.

Stephens, affiliated with the Republican party, won his own party nomination, defeating Rolph by approximately 22,000 votes, and also won the Prohibition and Progressive nominations.

Rolph, a Republican, won the Democratic nomination overwhelmingly.

The vote, by parties, of the two principal contenders was as follows:

Stephens: Republican, 168,942; Democratic, 6257; Prohibition, 12,853; Progressive, 5142; total, 193,194.

Rolph: Republican, 146,990; Democratic, 74,955; Progressive, 980; Socialist, 704; Prohibition (believe it or not,) 97; total, 223,726.

Now, while permitting a candidate to file with as many registered parties as he may prefer, the primary law allows his name to go on the final election ballot only in the event of his winning the nomination of the party of his affiliation and, hence, while receiving 30,000 more votes than Stephens, Rolph did not get a place on the November ticket because he failed to get the Republican nomination, and the Democratic party, which had given him a nomination in preference to regular Democrats, was not recognized in the final election. However, more than 20,000 voters wrote Rolph's name on their ballots.

There is no particular point to be applied from the 1918 primary election episode to the present contest except, possibly, conjecture as to what could happen if a large number of nominal Democrats favoring Rolph should drift into the Republican registration this year.

If this should occur, the outlook might appear uncertain.

Rolph, to date, is the sole avowed antiprohibitionist in the field; all the others are acceptable to the drys and, presumably, Young, Fitts, Riley would be viewed as equally entitled to dry indorsement. Richardson, of course, if he should enter, would likewise have dry indorsement.

It is unlikely that the wet mayor of San Francisco could muster sufficient strength to overcome the combined weight of the dry sentiment, but he could—and doubtless would—dance on the political horizon as a disturbing element capable at any time of reaching cyclonic proportions.

These matters are being given studious attention by many astute individuals in California at this time, not the least attentive among them being Messrs. Young, Rolph, Riley, Fitts and Richardson.

Here, indeed, is material sufficient, and to spare, for a Governor's conference pa excellence.

Goldsmiths of London recently celebrated their sixth hundredth anniversary of incorporation.

THE MISSION

[To John Steven McGroarty approaching celebration of thousandth performance of February 17.]

Madre de Dios! What this?
The door to yesterday ajar,
And through it comes of tambourines
And fiddles singing dusk afar!

And who are these the eyed advance
With laughter on make once more
Fiesta where they sang leons rock
Against the sun upon shore?

Under the twisted where they lift
The chalice of the this recall
From groves of Pa hear again

And answering them with bearded lips,
Red heels, rebozo jackets, braves—

This truce you make that we may yet
Hear voices singing yesterday
Will hold us all your debt.

THE MISSION PLAY

[To John Steven McGroarty, approaching celebration of the thousandth performance of the Mission Play, February 17.]

Madre de Dios! What mischief is this?
The door to yesterday stands ajar,
And through it comes the throb of tambourines
And fiddles singing at the dusk afar!

And who are these that stand eyed advance
With laughter on red lips to make once more
Fiesta where they saw the jacaleons rock
Against the sun upon a golden shore?

Under the twisted fig trees where they lift
The chalice of their plenty this recall
From groves of Prosperine, hear again
La hota and the holy mission call.

And answering throng with bearded lips,
Red heels, rebozos, silver jackets, braves—
Flash of white teeth and flame of dusky eyes—
Adventurers, padres, vaqueros, men, and knaves.

O chanter of lost peoples' prayer,
This truce you make with that we may yet
Hear voices singing out of yesterday
Will hold us all from your debt.

AUTOGRAPHS

The lure of "autographed copies" of books, now and then, seems to increase rather than diminish in this age of cheap reprints of books. It is a fact that many unusual writer-lecturers refuse to scribble his John Hancock on copies of his books presented for his signature by admiring Lirers. Certainly, in this day of mechanical devices it is encouraging to know that our favorite authors still possess the old art of chirography and that the writing of a book into increased value. Maybe this rage might be harnessed plained if authors affixed some sort of sentiment with their names such as is found in the "Romance of Letters," a new book recently published in London.

The village chestnut tree will soon be only a name to scholars and poets unless something is done, for this tree, once so common and plentiful, is almost extinct due to pests.

NARCOTIC CASE GROUP IN COURT

Three Doctors Accused of Drug Conspiracy

Two Other Persons Likewise Facing Charges

Hearing for All Fixed for the 11th Inst.

Accused of violating the State narcotic laws, five persons, three doctors, a druggist and a woman, were arraigned before Municipal Judge Ambrose yesterday following their arrest by Federal and city officers in the course of their drive against asserted drug distributors.

Three defendants, Dr. Samuel Cotterel, 45 years of age; Dr. Walter B. Hopkins, 47, and Benjamin Colly, 29, druggist, all negroes, were accused of conspiracy to violate the narcotic laws by falsifying and filling drug prescriptions which Cotterel and Hopkins, officers assert, made out for drugs to be mixed with other ingredients and Colly neglected to mix before selling the dope to "patients." Their arrest followed investigation of an asserted dope ring in the Central-avenue "black belt."

Dr. Clayton Allen and Mrs. Zula Allen, his wife, were charged with illegal sales of narcotics. They were arrested at their home, 1806 West Vernon avenue.

Hearing for all five defendants was set for the 11th inst. Bail of $2500 each was posted by the Allens and $2000 was set on each of the accused negroes.

APPEAL BENCH CHANGE MADE

Judge Fleming Will Be Kept in Superior Court by Pressure of Work

Because of the pressure of Superior Court affairs, Judge Fleming will continue in that department instead of sitting on the bench of Division Two of the Second Appellate District Court, it was stated yesterday at the office of the Judicial Council. The place that was to have been occupied by Judge Fleming will be filled by Judge Norton of San Luis Obispo.

Fire Insurance Fight Closes

At the close of the testimony taken in the action brought by Mrs. Anna Miller against the Security Insurance and the National Fire Insurance companies for $10,000, Superior Judge Westover took his decision under submission.

Mrs. Miller brought the suit to collect on policies she held on her Elisabeth Lake sanatorium which burned to the ground on the night of July 21, 1927. The companies refused to pay the policies on the ground that the property had been overvalued at the time the insurance was taken out on it.

IMPROVEMENT PETITIONED

A petition asking for the improvement of Sixty-ninth street between Main street and Broadway was filed with the City Council yesterday by Thomas J. and Nellie L. Stephens. The improvement asked for consists of concrete pavement thirty-six feet wide and sidewalks. The petition was referred to the City Engineer and the Public Works Committee.

ENTRIES BREAK RECORD IN ORATORICAL CONTEST

Increase Especially Evident Among Smaller Secondary Schools; Groupings Revealed

BY CHARLES S. SPRAGUE

With the closing of the first semester and the clearing away of the various activities that crowd this particular period of the school year, such as graduating exercises, class plays concerts, debates, elections and so on, the various high schools of Southern California, Arizona and Nevada, comprising the group sponsored by the Los Angeles Times, are addressing themselves to the one great forensic contest of the year, the National Oratorical Contest with the American Constitution as its compelling theme.

It is the one outstanding school contest of the year because of the dignity of the theme; because it implies and necessitates a thorough mastering of the Constitution of the United States; because the contest has become a permanent national and international event and because the rewards of victory are richer and more brilliantly alluring in their material and cultural values than have ever heretofore challenged the best forensic efforts of the youth of the land.

RESPONSE SWIFT

Although official announcement of the seventh national and sixth international contest was made only three weeks ago, when entry blanks were sent to the high schools of this zone inviting them to participate, already there has been such a prompt and general acceptance as to guarantee a fuller participation and more spirited rivalry than in any previous year in the history of the contest. Of the scores of high schools of Los Angeles city and county, technically known as "secondary schools," 98 per cent have already filed their entrance papers and there is an assurance of practically 100 per cent by the time the "tardy bell" rings—a record never before approached.

Heretofore many of the smaller high schools have held aloof because they felt they had little show with schools of larger facilities, larger faculties and greater school population to draw from; but in the progress of the contest from year to year they have found the smaller schools right up to the front with the larger ones in number of victories and they have come to understand that while they might not be able to cope with the larger schools in athletic events which require group or mass co-operation, there may be a potential Webster, Sumner or Lincoln in the smallest school and that only the stimulus and opportunity of contest are needed to bring into the open latent and unsuspected talent of high order.

The intensive study of the constitution and the forensic contest thereon have a strong appeal to school authorities, pupils and patrons of schools as it is coming to be understood that the best education teaches individual responsibility under law and established order, and that the tendency nowadays is to direct young people along right paths. For this reason patrons of schools not only encourage, but demand that their school participate in this contest with the constitution as its theme.

This year the director of the contest in this zone, popularly known as the "Times Zone," is offering for the first time cash prizes for the contests in the local schools. Heretofore, the prizes began in the district contest and followed in increasing importance up to the grand prize of the national finals. This has added a further stimulant for the smaller school to enter the lists. These cash prizes will be given in addition to the prizes given by the local newspapers and civic bodies.

PATRIOTIC PROJECT

In this connection it might be said that while the National Oratorical contest in this district or zone is nominally designated as a Times contest, it should be clearly understood that this is merely a convenient or practical means of designation or identification. The contest in this zone of Southern California, Arizona and Nevada, as well as throughout the United States, is in reality a movement sustained by a combined press. In this zone, the Times sponsors the contest as a whole, whereas in the various localities the contest is sponsored by the local newspapers. It is solely an unselfish gesture of the press for patriotic education, to increase interest in and respect for the basic principles of our government.

Having formally filed their entrance blanks as participants in the contest for 1930, the schools are looking forward with keen interest to the announcement of the grouping for the contest to learn what schools they will have to compete with. This information is now being sent out from the office of Prof. Alan Nichols, director of the contest, in the form of charts. The grouping is graphically shown on these charts. They set out in detail the districting and general plan of the National Oratorical Contest throughout the States of Nevada and Arizona and of Southern California. A circular letter which accompanies the charts, states that the districting this year, except in Arizona and Nevada, is based generally on the athletic leagues of the California Interscholastic Federation. Thus, District No. 1 includes the schools in the Orange League; District No. 2, the Riverside League; District No. 3, Tri-County League and so forth.

The object is to place in competition, at least in the first interscholastic elimination, schools of approximately the same size; but this has not been uniformly possible. The several factors of geographical location, enrollment and interest in past contests have again combined to make the grouping difficult and possibly not free from either inconsistencies or inequities. The increase in school population and the erection of many new high schools have necessitated slight enlargement of the districts. A great deal of study has been given to the matter, however, and it is hoped that it will prove the most satisfactory that can be devised, considering all the varying circumstances.

NUMBER REDUCED

Last year the districts numbered forty-one; this year a more advantageous grouping and consolidation have reduced the districts to thirty-eight. The work of organizing these districts for the district contests is not completed. The school selected to act as "host" for the event and the teacher selected as "supervisor" of the district for the purposes of the district elimination contest will be announced soon.

The grouping of the foregoing districts for the purposes of The Times semifinals has been completed and the schools at which the contests are to be held, have been selected in most instances. The grouping is as follows:

Group A—All schools in Districts Nos. 1 to 8, inclusive. Long Beach Polytechnic High School, "host" school.

Group B—Districts Nos. 9 to 15, inclusive. Bakersfield High School, "host" school.

Group C—Districts No. 16 to 23, inclusive. South Pasadena, "host" school.

Group D—Districts Nos. 24 to 30, inclusive. Lincoln High School, "host" school.

Group E—Districts Nos. 31 to 38, inclusive. "Host" school in this group not definitely decided upon as yet; likewise, "host" schools for Groups F and G, but they will be announced in due time.

The local school contest to select representatives to the district contest must be held before April 11, for on this date the district contests will be held. The Times semifinals, that is group contests made up of the winners of the district contests, will be held April 25; and The Times grand finals, May 2.

Director Nichols has recently issued a bulletin stating that in the matter of extemporaneous speeches, such speeches will not be required in the local or district contests, but that a four-minute extemporaneous speech will be required of each contestant in the semifinals and grand finals in addition to his six-minute set speech and the topic assigned him will be upon some phase of the Constitution other than covered in his set oration. This is meeting with general favor among the schools.

CLASS IN FOREIGN TRADE

A class in foreign trade is announced at Manual Arts Evening High School each Wednesday from 7 to 9 p.m. Principal Helen V. Peasely stresses the growing importance of Los Angeles Harbor in connection with increasing foreign trade. This course offers practice as well as theory. Open discussion of all problems brought before the class is to develop interesting, instructive information.

YOUNG LEAVING FOR NEW BERTH

Local Panama Mail Traffic Manager Promoted

Will Fill Similar Post at New York Offices

Transfer Marks Inaugural of Expansion Plans

BY WALDO DRAKE

To be vice-president in charge of traffic of the expanding Panama Mail Steamship Company, William A. Young, long popular here as passenger traffic manager of Panama Mail, will leave today for New York to begin his new duties. Mr. Young's promotion and transfer to New York marks the beginning of the Panama Mail Line's program of expansion, including construction this year of four $3,500,000 express liners and establishment of Mexican coasting service.

W. P. Neeson, who has been assistant to Mr. Young at Panama Mail's California headquarters, will relieve him. Mr. Neeson, with the title of general passenger agent, will have headquarters at San Francisco.

Panama Mail officials said yesterday that present tentative plans provide for commencement of construction on the four intercoastal express liners not later than June 1, next. George A. Armes, San Francisco shipbuilder and president of the General Engineering and Drydock Company, is expected to return to San Francisco from New York this week, following a series of conferences with W. R. Grace & Co. executives, of which firm the Panama-Mail Line is a subsidiary, relative to construction of the four ships. Prior to his departure for New York, he was in negotiations with owners of a local shipyard toward probable construction of the ships here.

Mr. Young said yesterday that the Panama Mail Line expects award of the mail contract for the California-Central American run, on which construction of the new fleet is contingent, not later than the 12th inst.

LINER PENNSYLVANIA OUT FOR EAST TOMORROW

Panama-Pacific Line's 34,500-ton electric flagship Pennsylvania, in from the north this morning, will sail tomorrow morning for New York, via the Canal and Havana, with 450 cabin passengers. In her cargo holds will be 4000 tons of California products, chiefly dried and canned fruits, and 1000 bales of silk from Japan, valued at $1,000,000.

Angelenos sailing on the Pennsylvania include Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Joe E. Browning, Samuel Rosenthal and J. L. Adler, all going to Havana, and Judge and Mrs. James A. Cooper, Mrs. Rose Denker and her two daughters, and Mrs. Richard J. O. Culver, all for New York. Other Southlanders sailing are Mr. and Mrs. O. M. Overell and their daughter, Rosalie, of Beverly Hills; Capt. Richmond P. Hobson, United States Navy, retired, with Mrs. Hobson and their daughter, of San Diego; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Letts, Jr., with their two children, Diane and David, of Holmby Hills; George B. Shattuck, Santa Ana; Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Flagg, Pasadena; Mrs. Edith Lamm, and her daughter, Edith, Santa Barbara, and Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Mennell, Whittier.

Offshore passenger business at the port will be brisk today and tomorrow. In addition to the Pennsylvania, Panama Mail Line's intercoastal steamer Guatemala is due in from New York tomorrow morning with 120 travelers, while the Dollar globe liner President Fillmore is due at noon from Gotham with a similar number of passengers on her first trip under the Dollar house flag. The President Fillmore, well known on the Coast as the Panama-Pacific liner Mongolia, has been refitted for around-the-world service at a cost in excess of $1,000,000. Her luxurious accommodations include talking-picture reproduction equipment, first ship on the Pacific so fitted.

Capt. Frank Jansen, instructor in navigation and nautical astronomy at the University of Southern California, will take his class on a real offshore navigating cruise. The embryo mariners will leave the local port on the 12th inst. aboard Charles Ullman's ketch Evrian for a fortnight's cruise to Guadalupe Island, off the Mexican coast.

The purse seiner Oriental, returning from Santa Cruz Islands with sardines, struck a log or other obstacle and sank fifteen miles off Point Dume Friday, carrying down with her $3000 of nets, thirty-five tons of fish, supplies and personal belongings of the men. She was insured for $20,500.

Capt. Carl Antonovich fought an hour to save her, finally putting off in a skiff, from which they were picked up five minutes later by the purse seiner Sunbeam and brought to San Pedro yesterday.

The craft was seventy-three feet long, propelled by a 135-horsepower Diesel engine, and was built at Anacortes last year. Her owner, R. D. Suryan was negotiating to sell her to Dick Perica, and the deal was in escrow, when the accident happened.

RADIO CASE DECISION SETS NEW REGULATORY RULES

Precedent Established in WGY's Dispute Over Orders Issued by Federal Commission

BY JOHN S. DAGGETT

Advices from Washington set forth that "Restriction of time or power of radio stations by the Federal Radio Commission must be based on actual questions of public convenience and not made merely to carry out an arbitrary or theoretical system or policy of allocation." The net result of the action of the United States Supreme Court is, in effect, a declaration that the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia may hear and try all radio cases taken before it from the Federal Radio Commission de novo and enter such decision as it may think proper without regard to the decision of the Radio Commission

The action of the United States Supreme Court, taken in the case of station WGY, Schenectady, N. Y., in effect, upholds the decision of the lower tribunal, which had reversed the ruling of the commission. On this precedent, any station which feels itself aggrieved by allocation orders of the commission may appeal to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, where it may show that the contested restrictions are not based on valid complaint affecting "public convenience, interest or necessity."

KGO CHANNEL INVOLVED

The assignment of WGY to limited time on the cleared channel operated station KGO, Oakland, was followed by appeal to the District of Columbia Court, where decision was rendered that WGY should be allowed to operate with unlimited time on the frequency assigned KGO.

In its decision, the Appellate Court defines "public convenience, interest or necessity" at length, and asserts that under the commerce clause of the Constitution Congress has the power to provide for the reasonable regulation of the use and operation of radio stations, and further that the holding of a license prior to the enactment of the radio law does not create property rights which may be asserted against the regulatory power of the United States, if that power is properly restricted.

OLD LANDMARK WILL BE SAVED

San Juan Bautista Mission Rest House Crumbling

Wealthy Angeleno Will Foot Bill for Restoration

Indians Formerly Locked Up in Unique Structure

BY HARRY CARR

"Get an architect; restore the old mission; and send me the bill."

The message that came to me from a wealthy Los Angeles man means that one of the most interesting landmarks of California is to be saved from the winter storms.

This is the old rest room—often called the jail—at the Mission San Juan Bautista.

It is especially important that this should be saved for the reason that San Juan Mission shows more of the old life of the padres than any other mission now standing.

CHURCH PARTS PRESERVED

In the old days, the church edifice was only a part of a large and elaborate institution. In nearly every mission, the church is the only building that remains.

At San Juan, however, there is still the old patio, the kitchens and dining-rooms of the priests, the dining-rooms, cellars and so on. One of the rooms that still stands was the guest-room where they entertained the weary traveler in the days before there were hotels and every mission was, in a sense, a refuge.

This rest house was unique, however, even in the days of the missions.

Each mission was famous for something or other; San Antonio for its fine thoroughbred horses; Santa Inez for its leather workers; San Gabriel for its vineyards; San Luis Rey for its great cattle herds.

MUSIC FAMOUS

San Juan was famous, among other things, for its music.

There was a padre named Tapis who was one of the most extraordinary characters of the day. An accomplished musician, he wrote much sacred music and trained the Indians in choral singing. Many of his hand-illumined manuscripts still remain.

The Indians became very proud of their music. Knowing their weakness for fire water, they would come in from the surrounding rancherias and ask the padres to lock them up until after the celebration of mass. They didn't want to fall down in their singing.

REMAINS OF BUNKS SEEN

This rest room or jail was set apart by the padres for that especial purpose. It is redolent with the memory of these long-dead native singers. Inside there are still the remains of the bunks and beds. It was divided into a ground floor and a sort of loft.

Within the last few years this room has been rapidly decaying and would have fallen in during the rains of this year.

After it has been rebuilt, there is a probability that it will again become a rest room to which recommended travelers may go for periods of rest. The suggestion has been made that it be called "La Casita Descanso". (the little house of peace.)

Tourists can see this unique place. It stands directly back of the church part of the mission—one large room whose purpose is not definitely known, intervenes between the sacristy and the rest room—or jail which is to be restored.

COL. LINDBERGH FURTHER IMPROVES NEW PLANE

Two new gadgets on Col. Charles A. Lindbergh's Lockheed monoplane—one of which added nine miles an hour to its speed and the other to enable it to keep an even keel in blind flying weather—were tried out with success by the noted pilot in a series of tests yesterday.

Since ordering the Sirius several months ago Col. Lindbergh has had in mind a plan to cover the two open cockpits for protection against cold in winter, yet enable him and Mrs. Lindbergh to enjoy the freedom of an open ship when the weather permits.

Jerry Vultee, chief engineer of the Lockheed Aircraft Company, put the colonel's idea into practice and yesterday the ship went aloft with a pair of transparent sliding hatches.

When closed they increased the plane's top air speed from 171 miles an hour to 180. This was due to the closed hatches creating a smooth flow of air instead of allowing it to whip in and around the open cockpits.

Each hatch can be closed or opened separately. Both seats can be dropped about six inches when the hatches are closed.

A local product, the Schenk gyropendulum, was installed to augment the set of blind flying instruments. It resembles an indicating finger rising vertically from a bowl-shaped container. The finger remains constantly in a vertical position because of a wind-driven gyroscope, indicating on a glass covering, marked off in circles and bisecting lines through its center whether the ship is flying level. The novel instrument takes care of all three axes of the ship.

As long as the needle points to the center of the circle the ship is level. Col. Lindbergh has it mounted in front of his control stick at about knee-level.

The instrument was first tested by Lieut. Harold Bromley in his first trans-Pacific attempt ship. He witnessed Lindbergh's flights yesterday from the Lockheed field, talked to Col. Lindbergh about his proposed attempt to span the Pacific in a ship similar to the colonel's new one, and took off for El Paso, Tex.

Besides Vultee, D. W. Tomlinson, vice-president of the T.A.T.-Maddux Airlines, and Capt. John A. MacReady, former Army pilot, were taken up by Col. Lindbergh for short hops. Mrs. Lindbergh did not accompany her husband to the airdrome.

DONOVAN PLANS UTMOST EFFORT

Colorado River Conference Head on Way Here

Civic Leaders Appealed to to End Deadlock

State Delegation Quarrel Bar to Agreement

With a final effort due to be made at Phoenix Wednesday to bring California and Arizona together on the Colorado River problem, interest centered yesterday on the California commission, whose inability to agree within its own ranks as to the best solution of the problem resulted in a recess being taken in the Reno conference.

Col. W. J. Donovan, chairman of the conference and representative of the President at the deliberations, will arrive in Los Angeles tomorrow morning to make preparations for the resumption of the conference at Phoenix. He plans to consult a number of prominent local men on the subject. Donovan is insistent that there is still hope for an agreement between the two States. If there is a chance to agree his policy is to continue carrying on negotiations.

TWO POINTS SETTLED

Two definite developments resulted from the Reno conference. One was that the door is not closed to further dealings between Arizona and California, representatives of both leaving the conference in good humor and saying they will be glad to talk the matter over further. The other was the recognition that the Californians will have to compose the difference existing in their own group before they can be in any position to deal with Arizona or any other State on the Colorado River problem.

Incidentally this phase of California's problem cropped out at the Reno conference due to inadvertence or misunderstanding. Gov. Young's wire to the California commission calling upon any one or more groups within the State to submerge their claims for the good of the whole was given publicity by Col. Donovan, who understood the wire to have been addressed to the conference and not to the California commission.

CALIFORNIANS PEEVED

The California people have been conducting their business rather secretively, and it was obvious that they were not particularly pleased by the Governor's wire. His mention of possible disintegration of the Metropolitan Water District unless some accord is reached also brought out the fact that there apparently is a conflict of opinion as to whether that district or the Imperial Valley Irrigation District is to make the sacrifice to meet Arizona's demands. There is no deep feeling over the matter nor is there any "war." It is simply that the difference between them has not been composed and it must be composed, and it can be composed amicably if each is willing to do what one of the men at the conference described as "taking a chance."

The first difficulty at the Reno conference hit California on the suggested program of procedure. Donovan laid down a program at the opening of the conference calling for disposal of the water problem between California and Arizona before the power or any other phase was taken up. Later, the California men began to say, after several days of conference, that it was no use to ask the State to accept a tentative agreement on water until Arizona's demands on power and other points were known. The reply was that this should have been made clear at the outset of the conference and that silence inferred acceptance of the suggested program.

It also became apparent, according to information that leaked out from the California group, that each faction or interest within the group was insisting on a clear paper title to every drop of water it might use from now on. The suggestion came back: "Why not each one take as much as he can get legal title to and take a chance on the rest of it?"

Engineers at a general conference between the States all agreed that there is enough water coming down the Colorado to the lower basin to provide for all demands for at least fifty years, that is, if all users of the river grow as they have been growing, they can continue to take water out of the river for fifty years without curtailment for anyone. By that time, engineers say, there will be new projects on the river to help further to conserve the waters.

JOHNSON APPROVES WILBUR'S STAND

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1. (AP)—A statement from Secretary Wilbur that he did not consider mandatory the Interior Department's solicitor's ruling which said the Boulder Dam Act failed to require preferential power distribution to municipalities and States, was read and lauded in the Senate today by Senator Johnson, Republican, California.

FORMER FIRE CHIEF SEIZED

Accused of having attempted to extort $500 from George E. Ross, 1015 West Seventh street, following his asserted discovery of liquor in a car owned by Ross which had figured in a wreck at Eighth street and Western avenue, Walter Lips, former Los Angeles Fire Chief and one-time deputy sheriff, was arrested early yesterday by Detective Lieutenant Parker of Wilshire division. He is charged with suspicion of attempted extortion.

According to Ross's story to police, the car was driven by another man and he was unaware that the accident had occurred until Lips called him by telephone, informing him that he had witnessed the wreck and had seen him (Ross) run from the scene immediately after the crash. The informant further declared he had found liquor in the wrecked machine and, according to Ross, demanded hush money in the sum of $500, threatening to notify police if his demand were refused.

Ross made an appointment to meet Lips, he said, and, by the meantime, reported the matter to police. Accompanied by the officer, Ross met Lips and paid him $60 in marked money. When Lips accepted the money and asked about payment of the balance, he was arrested by the detective, the latter say.

Police records indicate that Lips was sentenced to San Quentin penitentiary in 1922 for a similar offense and served five years, having been released in 1927. He was a deputy sheriff at the time he was convicted.

Lips is 56 years of age and lives at 2851 Brighton avenue.

SHRINE CIRCUS THRONGED

Twelve Thousand Jam Auditorium to Enjoy Three Hours of Fun Provided by Fifty Acts

Nearly 12,000 persons attended the two opening performances of the unique Shrine Circus at the Shrine Auditorium, Thirty Second and Royal streets, yesterday. Director General Stanton A. Bruner of the circus committee was jubilant. "It is going over big," he said.

The enormous stage was transformed into a big top with trapese bars dangling, tight ropes stretched and tumblers' rings suspended from snaky lines.

Fifty or more acts, star-performers from the Ringling, Hagenback and Al G. Barnes circuses, massed to present three hours of thrills and fun. Fifty clowns did their funmaking, while kids shrieked their approval. The tempo was fast and there was not a minute let-up.

A menagerie attracted considerable attention and the great hall which featured the sideshows and freaks gave it a real circus air. The recently imported sea elephants were a big attraction. There was the boy who liked to eat fire and the girl with the snakes and the baboon man and the living skeleton. There was the troupe of midgets and the fat lady and the rubber-skinned man. Bands, horns, drums, balloons, crackerjack—sticky round-eyed kids dragged along by parents, barkers, fortune tellers—it was the real thing and it will last for a solid week.

The swinging ladder act with Hazel Rose and company and the unsupported ladder act with Tony Pina, the Roman Rings and wire act were presented on the Pacific Coast for the first time yesterday.

Ben Laietsky's circus band had Charles Rodrick as guest conductor. Comedy acrobats included the Hart brothers, the Three Joeys and the Schaller Trio and the Kitchens and Three Comiques and McAffee and Phillips on a revolving ladder.

The aerial Christensens and Vera Patt and Frank Zerado, in double trapeze acts gave the audience a thrill, and Lita Hewitt in the loop the loop added to the excitement. The Barnes performing elephants drew a great hand.

The Klinkhart Midgets on the wire were excellent. Senorita Hermine was a sensation and received a round of applause for her fine riding.

Miss Vera Patt and Miss Marie Sweeney, on the webbs, and Caroline Hodgini in a cloud swing brought the great crowd to its feet. Havemann in his animal act presented an unusual performance. The Pina and McKeone family, acrobats, did some tall and fancy tumbling.

The four Bell-Thasers, equilibrists, presented a remarkable sense of balance. The Flying Fords and a balancing trapese act by Le Tourneau, Behee, Zerado and Ricardo closed the show.

The proceeds of the circus will be devoted to charitable purposes by the Shrine. Two performances are given daily and will continue to and including next Sunday.

CONSTABLE ACCUSED OF FRAUD DEAL

Inglewood Officer Said in Complaint to Have Kept Bail of Motorist

Harry Amend, constable of Inglewood township, is charged with embezzlement of $100 of county funds in a complaint filed yesterday by Dep. Dist.-Atty. McIsaac following an investigation into complaints of more than a dozen motorists that certain officers in Inglewood had failed to return their bail money after they had been released from custody.

The constable's bail is fixed at $3000.

According to Blayney Matthews, assistant chief of the bureau of investigation of the District Attorney's office, the inquiry will be pressed further this week to ascertain whether other officers are involved, and if there are any additional cases.

The complaint specifically accuses Amend of taking $100 cash bail from James Gerard, 922 South Oak street, Inglewood, following a traffic accident in Inglewood on November 26, 1929. It is further charged that Amend neglected to surrender this money to the county treasury.

Throng Pays Final Tribute

Business associates of Mrs. Lena R. Pepperdine, former vice-president and treasurer of the Western Auto Supply Company, during her business career, acted as pallbearers at the funeral services conducted for her yesterday at the Kiefer & Eyerick chapel in Glendale. The services were attended by more than 500 friends and relatives. Mrs. Pepperdine died several weeks ago in Hawaii from an illness believed to be psittacosis or parrot disease.

The pallbearers were R. V. Langford, A. B. Armstrong, W. L. Tibbals, T. C. Bowles, F. W. Oliver, George Stretz, C. O. Jennings and E. L. Keebler. In addition the following were honorary pallbearers: C. S. Albro, Hal Reynolds, Dr. Louis Joseph, J. F. Sheran, C. P. Turner, S. G. Miles, H. I. Press and F. C. Ackerman.

Following the services, which commenced at 2 p.m., Mrs. Pepperdine was buried in Forest Lawn Memorial Park.

EXECUTIVE TAKES HIS NEW POST

H. W. Kingsley Arrives to Direct Sears, Roebuck Stores in Coast Area

H. W. Kingsley, recently appointed assistant vice-president of Sears Roebuck & Co. in charge of the Pacific Coast territory, arrived here yesterday to take up his new duties. Before his promotion he was in charge of the company's retail stores in the Philaedlphia territory.

The Ninth-street and Boyle-avenue office of the company will be Mr. Kingsley's headquarters and from there he will administer the affairs of the company's thirty stores in the Pacific Coast area in addition to directing its old-established mail-order business in this region.

Evidence of the rapidity of local expansion is seen, he said, in the fact that the first Sears Roebuck retail store on the Coast was established in July, 1926, since when twenty-nine others have been opened, and with the opening of three more next month there will be thirty-three such retail stores in operation in the territory under his direction.

The three cities in which new stores are to be opened next month are Pasadena, making five in the local metropolitan area; Oakland and Spokane.

PURPORTED RED AGENTS GIVEN FINES

Communist Secretary and Three Others Convicted of Passing Dodgers

Frank Spector, local secretary of the Communist party of America, was fined $100 and Benjamin Lavine, Irving Kreitzberg and Edward A. Sandler, asserted Reds, were fined $25 each yesterday by Municipal Judge Bogue, following their conviction on charges of violating the city handbill ordinance by passing out soviet dodgers in front of Music Arts Hall, 233 South Broadway, on July 31, 1929. The fines were paid.

Deputy City Prosecutor Jack called only two witnesses against the four men, Detective Lieutenant Hynes, head of the police intelligence division, and Officer Anderson. He introduced dodgers taken from the defendants at the time of their arrest, calling on citizens to "Defend the Soviet Union" and "Rally to International Red Day" and announcing mass meetings at 233 South Broadway and in the Plaza on August 1, 1929, the date designated by the Russian soviet as international Red day. The two officers identified the dodgers and told of arresting the men as they were engaged in passing them out near Second street and Broadway at 9 p.m. Both meetings were halted by police, evidence disclosed.

MARY, DOUG TO ADOPT CHILD

'small, poor house,' although he was quite evidently inordinately proud of it!"

REMINDED OF THE WAR

Mary and Doug said that they had evidence that the war was on, while they were in Shanghai, for they heard several shots.

"We couldn't sleep in Hongkong for the noise of the wooden sandals on the pavements. Especially when certain street merchants who attract attention to their wares by pounding on their shoes with a bamboo stick—which makes, though, a really rather musical sound—got busy under our windows."

Of course, we had to know about Mary's shopping for all the gorgeous jades and cloisonnes and ivories which were shown us.

Oh, there were adventure and romance!

DOUG'S PURCHASE

"I strayed all accidentally one day in Shanghai into the forbidden part of the city," Mary told us, "where it is dangerous for foreigners to be. My guide was so enthusiastic over my desire to find a certain turquoise Buddha that I had heard about and which I longed to possess, or else he craftily was looking for friends in the district. I found myself, by some means or other, surrounded before I realized it by peering yellow faces. But I braved it out. And we did find the Buddha, and I got safely back to my hotel.

"The Chinese said a funny thing as I was bargaining with him—you always haggle, you know—as, speaking in pidgin English, he exclaimed excitedly, 'If I no speak right price, I dog in the street, car on neck!'"

Douglas Fairbanks went thirty miles out from Hongkong and bought a Chinese temple! It had a lovely blue-and-gold door and marvelously terraced balconies, and when Doug and his friend got inside, they found sail-makers at work. Doug rooted around until he found the proper authority from whom to purchase it, and is to set the temple up at his ranch, to use as a theater and Chinese museum.

"That's not all. We're going to build a Japanese pagoda, too," Mary said, "to house our large collection of Japanese things."

Mary told us how sorry they felt for the 'rickshaw men. She had employed one in particular, but one cold morning she was told that he was dead—told quite calmly by a fellow-'rickshaw man.

"The 'rickshaw men all cough," said Mary, "and on each cold morning forty or fifty of them will be found dead in the main streets or close by."

We asked about the studios in Japan, and it seems that they are making a great many pictures. One studio in Kyoto makes 100 pictures a year, and the Japanese actors and directors and technical men put in hours that we wouldn't dream of putting in.

LIKE TALKIES

"The studios are rather primitive compared to ours, since their lighting systems and other apparatus are not nearly up to our standards; but this is no fault of theirs, as they are most anxious to learn and to acquire the right equipment.

"Some of their stories are modern and foreign to them. At one place we found the players all dressed in Spanish costume, while some of the companies make only the classics."

CRITIC REVIEWS NEW TRENDS

well for it leads to the climaxing events of the plot.

There is no stinting of effort, to all intents and purposes, in this new domain of melody.

RUDOLF FRIML is still writing the score for "Bride 66." He is the latest temperamental star on the United Artists lot. Friml composes by inspiration solely, and there is never any telling when it will hit.

This composer of such successes as "Rose Marie," "Katinka," "The Firefly," and others, is also to do the music for the first production starring Evelyn Laye, the English star, who has been winning such amazing plaudits in "Bitter Sweet."

Samuel Goldwyn, who has her under contract, tells me she will arrive here about the middle of June. She finishes her engagement in "Bitter Sweet" April 15 and then will go to England for a two months' vacation.

I SAW the tests of Miss Laye, and heard her sing, and there is no question but that Goldwyn has another remarkable find, comparable with his earlier notable discoveries for silent drama.

Miss Laye has charm and refinement, and with it a lovely voice. The test was not calculated to disclose her personal beauty, because made without any particular preparation, but it is obvious that she possesses a distinct feminine allure.

Women with beauty and voices are being sought this season, and apparently here is one of the first real stars possessed of both.

Goldwyn declares that he would have signed her several years ago because of her personal attributes, for the screen, had it not been for the fact that the allure of her voice would have been lost in the silent medium.

Her arrival in Hollywood is going to be one of the events, in a degree, because no end of suspense is being created concerning it by Goldwyn himself.

KOLB AND DILL FIGHTING AGAIN

of each other's way with ease and, I might add, discretion."

"The first type of German comic we played was the one who twisted his words—put the cart before the horse—such as, 'I upstairs go,'" said Kolb. "Later we switched to garbled speech, rolling out long sentences with difficulty. The tempo was slowed up too much by this method so we changed again to short and snappy dialogue, with enough accent to carry out the illusion of our characters."

The two comedians have been in retirement for about three years, although living far apart. They came together again at Duffy's insistence. They recently appeared in two plays in San Francisco with success, and their many old friends and some new ones will be looking forward to their new debut with interest.

Dresses That Matter Are Dresses That Flatter! . . . . These Do!

Speaking of Hemlines

. . . your skirt length depends on what you do! Bullock's suggests this simple "fashion-yardstick" for correct skirt lengths:

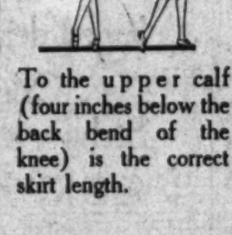
When You Play Tennis or Golf

To the upper calf (four inches below the back bend of the knee) is the correct skirt length.

When You Shop, Go To Business

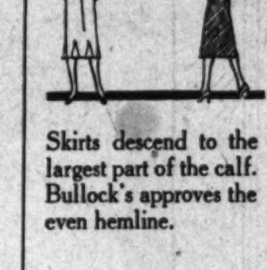
Skirts descend to the largest part of the calf. Bullock's approves the even hemline.

For Bridge---Or Dining Informally



Ankle length is the mode. Again, the even hemline is smarter.

But For Very Grand Occasions



Skirts may sweep the floor. Trains have their hour, though many skirts just clear the floor.

Important! Jacket Dresses--- Polka Dots---Cap Sleeve, $49.50!

Easy-to-wear versions of the new silhouette. Yes, this group includes all the most important types of Jacket Dresses! The Embroidered Coat with the Plain Dress—the Print Coat with Plain Dress—Polka Dots—Jabots—Peplum Costumes. Flat Crepes—Prints—(And at this same interesting price, a new group of one-piece Dresses that you really must see!) $49.50. Women's Dresses, Bullock's Third Floor Fashions.

Flattering! Lingerie Collars--- Irish Lace---Bows, Jabots, $49.50

Decidedly, we grow lady-like. What with Irish Lace edgings at neck and throat (yes indeed, and very smart, too!)—and such fetching fripperies as Bows at the waist in back. Normal Waistlines, of course—and Boleros that tactfully take care of any figure-fullness. The fetching new silhouette—expressed in Crepes and Georgettes. At $49.50! Misses' Dresses, Bullock's, Third Floor Fashions.

Society of Cinemaland

by Myra Nye

Ramon Novarro was the host de luxe at his own premiere, "Devil May Care," the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture at Carthay Circle Theater. And this is all the more noteworthy because Mr. Novarro is sometimes regarded as the recluse mysterious.

The star was host to a distinguished group of guests and was seen in the foyer and under the awning outside during the intermission affably signing his autograph for fans of the out-door gallery, who numbered thousands. Particularly interesting was it to note his animated conversation with Dolores Del Rio, for whom Novarro's lovely sisters are often mistaken.

In addition to this star's reception when he arrived and only second to it in the fans' evidenced approval was the coming of Lawrence Tibbett, whose premiere Ramon Novarro had attended a few days before. These two are the outstanding men of interest in sound pictures today, because both can sing and both can act.

Among other celebrities of Cinemaland were: Mrs. M. N. Samaniego, mother of Ramon, who was gowned in chiffon velvet, and wore a black velvet wrap trimmed in white fox; Miss Carmen Novarro, who wore blue chiffon; Miss Dorothy Jordan, the star's youthful leading lady, petite and charming in a French frock of peach soffle de soie evenly long in the skirt and set off with brilliants lavishly adorning the sleeves and bodice, and Del Rio in gown and wrap of silver cloth fashioned as though of molten gray metal.

Another premiere of distinction and charm as a social affair was that of the opening of the Civic Repertory Theater in Hollywood Monday evening. An air of smart sophistication in the audience and those interested in the venture set this affair a little apart. The actors themselves seemed to be an integral part of the occasion socially, among those to be mentioned prominently are: Marion Clayton from British Columbia; Arthur Greville Collins, London; Kenneth Duncan, Toronto and New York, now of Los Angeles; Maude Fealy, London; Mabel Gibson, Australia; Olaf Hytten, Glasgow; Paul Irving, Boyd Irwin, London; John E. Moss, H. Ellis Reed, Hollywood; Elise Bartlett, Hollywood; Eric Snowden, London and H. O. Stechan.

For Miss De Mille

As the day approaches for the marriage of Miss Cecilia Hoyt De Mille, daughter of the Cecil B. De Mille, to Francis Edgar Calvin, many are the smart prenuptial affairs arranged to fete the attractive young bride-elect.

Meeting Thursday evening at the De Mille home, sixteen members of the younger social set were guests of Miss Katherine Lester De Mille, who took the party to the Roosevelt for dinner and dancing in honor of her sister and her fiance. About the large table, decorated beautifully with early spring flowers, were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Liggett, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Gardner, Misses Nancy Adams, Evelyn Fiedde, Helen Thomas and Natalie Schenkelberger, Messrs. Bert Calvin, David Henderson, George Thomas, Philip Holmes, Edward Hunting, the hostess and honorees.

Friday evening Miss De Mille was the guest of Julia Faye, who entertained a score of guests with a supper party at 6:30 p.m. in her home, the affair being also a pajama shower for the bride-to-be.

Miss De Mille's wedding with Mr. Calvin is to be an event of Washington's Birthday, at 4 p.m. in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Sunday Night Supper

Invitations have been issued by Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Russell (Carlotta King) for a supper and dancing party to be given this evening in the Embassy Club. Their guests will be Mr. and Mrs. John Boles, Catherine Dale Owen, Evelyn Laverson, their house guest from Long Island, Margaret Ettinger, Prince Josef Troubetskoy, Rush Estes, Stewart Wille and William Gill.

Puppeteers Reopen Club

When you've danced yourself to death, seen every show in town, and played bridge until you're trumping your partner's ace, our suggestion of a solution to the what-to-do-Saturday-night problem is, "Try the Club Guignol."

Contrary to what its name may suggest, this is not a night club. It is a puppet show. Reopened by the Puppeteers at 6114 Glen Oak avenue in Hollywood, the organization presents an entirely new revue each Saturday and Sunday evening at 9 p.m., and also matinees the same days at 3 p.m. for children.

Among those present at the opening of the new musical revue, "My Man Friday," last week, were Colleen Moore, Julianne Johnson, Don Herold, William Slavin McNutt and Morgan Farley. The club seats but thirty-five persons. One of the most attractive features of the evening was a new portrait puppet of Miss Moore, who remained for more than an hour after the performance on the bridge, working the puppet of herself to the intense delight of the audience, who naturally remained in their seats while she invented new dance steps that even the puppet-maker never dreamed possible.

Other puppets in the revue are George Arliss, who acts as master of ceremonies after being introduced by "Sid Grauman." Gloria Swanson made her debut as a puppet "trespasser," and Jetta Goudal, Ramon Novarro and Gary Cooper also played prominent parts.

The musical revue is one of the most ambitious ever attempted by a puppet company, having as the climax a chorus of nine puppets with a solo dancer, operated by 179 strings. It is the "ostrich sisters," however, who undoubtedly are the hit of the show.

Recently the Puppeteers featured a replica of Ruth Chatterton for the lady herself, and not long ago Esther Ralston came to see her Orpheum act done to her delight on the puppet stage.

New Bachelor Club

Patterned after the famous Bachelor Club, which has a daily luncheon table at the Montmartre, with Tom Mix as presiding officer, another club has been formed to meet for luncheon at the Embassy Club. While the Embassy bachelors need not necessarily be single men, their wives will not be permitted to join them at the club table.

Charter members of the new organization, in which the membership has been limited to twenty-five, are George Fitzmaurice, John McCormick, Benjamin Glazer, John Considine, Jr., Harry D'Arrast and Count De Myoya.

Present Silver Cup

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Ellis (Vera Reynolds,) who have recently taken up their abode at the Hollywood Knickerbocker, were the guests of honor at the Montmartre Wednesday evening, when the latter judged the dancing contest and awarded a silver cup to the winners. Their guests were Mr. and Mrs. Alf Lathem, Margaret Ettinger, Ruth Querr, Ross Shattuck and Clifford Rouman.

The Montmartre's seventh anniversary was observed Monday evening with Charles Irwin acting as master of ceremonies for a gay program. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Mayo had as their guests that evening Mr. and Mrs. George Anderson (Natalie Kingston.) Mrs. Ona Wilson Brown, Doris Deane Arbuckle, Harvey Barnes and Al Hall, while others who entertained parties of eight guests or more were Mr. and Mrs. Jack Benny, Mr. and Mrs. Rupert Julian, Mr. and Mrs. Ned Sparks, Paultie Garon, Alice White, Elsie Janis, Ann Cornwall, William Powell, Rex Lease and Ross Shattuck.

Last Sunday evening a table which attracted much interest at the cafe was that of a party of New Yorkers, whose honored guest was Greta Garbo. At the same time Sidney Bartlett was host to Alice White and Estelle Brody, while Edmund Goulding had as dinner guests Elsie Janis and her mother, Mrs. Josephine Janis, and several other friends.

Luncheon Hostess

Sally Eilers was a luncheon hostess of Monday noon, entertaining Mrs. William Davey (Alyce Mills.) Josephine Dunn, Marian Nixon and Jeanette Loff at the Embassy Club.

Await Prince's Arrival

Lavish preparations are being made for the reception of Prince Leopold of Prussia, who will arrive in Hollywood next week for a brief visit and who, with his entourage, will take up his residence at the Roosevelt Hotel.

Word has been received from Mrs. John Emerson (Anita Loos) that the Prince, who has been visiting her in Miami, Fla., will arrive shortly for several weeks, and it is anticipated that he will be honored by numerous social affairs during his sojourn in Cinemaland.

Bridge-Luncheon

Mrs. Darryl Zanuck entertained recently with a smart bridge-luncheon for twelve guests in the Beverly Hills Hotel, tables for bridge being arranged in the Tea Garden House. In her party were Clara Horton, Ruth Clifford, Katherine McGuire, Gloria Hope, Mrs. Mervin LeRoy (Edna Murphy,) Bernadine Rand, Mildred Eberly, Doris Gittelson, Alice Gittelson, Maryanne Plato and Gladys Baxter.

Delightful Reunion

One by one members of the original cast of "The Desert Song" as presented in New York have been coming to Hollywood. Last Sunday afternoon those who are here were entertained by Alexander Gray in his North Oxford-street home, the party being a reunion of many old friends.

A buffet supper was served at the close of a merry afternoon of singing and reminiscing, in which Bernice Claire, Marjorie Eddie, Carlotta Miles, Mr. and Mrs. Ben Hendricks, Bunny Granville and Phil Ryder took part.

Mr. Gray came to Hollywood a year ago, and since then has gained great popularity as a host.

Visiting Daughter

Mrs. S. M. Lederer of Chicago arrived during the week to be the guest of her new son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Nick Stuart (Sue Carol) in Hollywood, and to give her blessing to the newly weds. Her visit, which is her first to the west coast since the marriage of her daughter, will be of several weeks' duration.

Entertained at Club

Forrester Harvey, English actor now appearing in "Journey's End," was the honored guest of a luncheon given this week at the Writers' Club by Phil Lonergan.

Arrowhead Vacation

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Gribbon spent several days of last week at Arrowhead Springs.

Birthday Celebration

In celebration of the birthday anniversary of Fred Ashby of Beverly Hills Mr. and Mrs. Fred Besner of London, Eng., entertained last evening at the Lakeside Country Club. Thirty of the Cinemalite were bidden to the affair, for which dance music was furnished by Fred Ashby, Jr., and his twenty-piece orchestra. Entertainment for the evening was arranged by Honey Percy.

Two Dinners

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Cawthorn of Linden Drive gave one of their delightful dinners last week, when their guests were Mr. and Mrs. John Barrymore (Dolores Costello) and Mr. and Mrs. William Kernell. Thursday evening Mr. and Mrs. Cawthorn, John McCormick and Mrs. McCormick were the honored guests at a dinner given by the Barrymores.

Stag Party

No wives were bidden to the party at which James Gleason was host last evening at his home in Alpine Drive, Beverly Hills. Cards were played and a buffet luncheon was served at midnight.

House Guest

Walter Lang has been present several days at Flintridge as guest of James Crume.

For Distinguished Visitors

Complimenting Sir Charles and Lady Allenby of London, two small luncheons have been given at the Ambassador, the Embassy Club and the Montmartre by Marion Davies. At the Montmartre Miss Davies's guests, in addition to the honorees, were Lenore Ulric and Sidney Blackmer.

Proper Music for Film Held Serious Wor

Perfection of the right kind o[f] for the sound films is t[he] chief concern of our presen[t] musicians, according to Dimi[tri] Tiomkin, Metro-Goldwyn-May[er] composer and author of sever[al] numbers in "The Rogue Song," no[w] playing at the Chinese Theater an[d] "Devil May Care," which is showin[g] at the Carthay Circle.

The limitations of the acou[stic] screen as well as its great poten[tial]ities make it imperative, Tiom[kin] believes, for the musician de[s]iring to compose for it to give th[e] most painstaking preliminar[y] study, if he is to create music whic[h] will reproduce to the best advan[tage].

There are "tricks of the trad[e]" in composing for the films just a[s] there exist in composing for th[e] concert stage, where innumerable [de]vices means may be observed f[or] creating a number more effectiv[e] Tiomkin avers. Only continue[d] study and experimentation will en[able] the musician to do work whic[h] will register best on the screen.

Betty Bronson Now Playing in Mature Role

When Betty Bronson gave h[er] characterization in "Peter Pan" it was freely predicted that s[he] must either continue in youthf[ul] roles or suffer from loss of prestig[e]. Then her director, Herbert Brenon, bid her to stick to such parts as [for] a time, it seemed that his a[d]vice was good, although she co[n]tinued to desire more mature rol[es]. There is a "between ages" in th[e] lives of all young motion-picture ac[tors] known that is frequently referr[ed] to as transition from youth to ma[n]hood. This often proves serious [and] many have failed to pass th[is] test. At the time she acted in "P[eter] Pan," Miss Bronson was 16 an[d] one of the youngest girls who ev[er] acted such an outstanding ro[le] yet she has passed "the crisis" [and] is to be evidenced by the cha[r]acterizations in which she is no[w] being cast. Her first sophisticated part was in "The Locked Door," current attraction at the Unite[d] Artists.

Proper Music for Film Held Serious Work

Selection of the right kind of music for the sound films is the most concern of our present-day musicians, according to Dimitri Tiomkin, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer composer and author of several scores in "The Rogue Song," now playing at the Chinese Theater and "Look May Care," which is showing at the Carthay Circle.

"The limitations of the sound screen as well as its great potentialities make it imperative, Tiomkin believes, for the musician devoting to compose for it to give the subject painstaking preliminary study if he is to create music which will have relevance to the best advantage.

"Films are 'tricks of the trade' in composing for the films just as different exist in composing for the concert stage, where innumerable effects by means may be observed for creating a number more effective, though severs. Only continued study and experimentation will enable the musician to do work which will register best on the screen.

Betty Bronson Now Playing in Mature Roles

When Betty Bronson gave her characterization in "Peter Pan," it was freely predicted that she would either continue in youthful roles or suffer from loss of prestige. Her director, Herbert Brenon, urged her to stick to such parts and, for a time, it seemed that his advice was good, although she continued to desire more mature roles. Miss Bronson is a "between ages" in the career of all young motion-picture actresses that is frequently referred to as a transition from youth to maturity. This often proves serious and many have failed to pass the test. At the time she acted in "Peter Pan," Miss Bronson was 16 and one of the youngest girls who ever created such an outstanding role. That she has passed "the crisis" is said to be evidenced by the characterizations in which she is now being cast. Her first sophisticated part was in "The Locked Door," a First National attraction at the United Artists.

SPANISH STARS

Others of the Spanish tongue are Don Jose Mojica, now a prominent Fox player. A former opera star, Mojica has recently finished his first picture, "One Mad Kiss." It was made in English. Ramon Novarro, of course, is a native of Mexico. With Renee Adoree he will be seen in "The Singer of Seville." The songs will be in Spanish and Italian. Then, there is Noni Vendrel, stage star of Mexico City, who is to play opposite Jose Bohr in a picture now entitled "Heart Strings." The same players are to be in both the English and Spanish versions. Della Magana is in the same opus. She is an Argentine, having appeared also in France. Cesar Vasoni, another Argentine, is in the cast. He has been on the stage in Cuba, France and New York. The Jackie Coogan of Chile, Tito Pavinson, is finding ways to express himself after two rather discouraging American years. Lupita Tovar and Maria Alba, who was seen in "Hell's Heroes," are both making Spanish talkies. Lupita was discovered by Robert Flaherty in a school play in Mexico City. Mona Maris, from Argentina, is with Fox and has played one lead opposite Warner Baxter in "Romance of the Rio Grande" and is preparing for another with him in "The Arizona Kid."

In the French colony, Miss Maris has become an apt English talkie player. Lili Damita is in New York pepping up the show, "Sons O'Guns." Arlette Marchal, the wife of the director, Marcel de Sano, is believed to be in France at the present time. Jacques Feyder, who directed Greta Garbo in "The Kiss," is directing the French version of "The Unholy Night," with Jetta Goudal and Aubrey Leignet in the principal roles. That favorite of Parisian musical stages, Maurice Chevalier, is completing the French version of "The Big Pond." Claudette Colbert of the New York stage is his leading lady. Chevalier also was in the English version. He was an immediate success in America.

German versions are going ahead rapidly. "Rio Rita" has been made into one, as well as into a Spanish version. Zelnik directed the former and also the German interpretation of "The Case of Sergt. Grischa." His wife is Lya Mara, previously an actress in the German theater. A version of "Lummox" has been made and a Germanization of "All Quiet" planned. Those of "Broadway" and "Show Boat" are finished under the direction of Kurt Neuman. Victor Seastrom handled the German film of "Sun Kissed," in which Vilma Banky played the same part as she did in the English. Joseph Schildkraut was her leading man as he is Greta Garbo's in the production of "Anna Christie." Rudolph Schildkraut plays George Marion's role. The younger Schildkraut, Joseph, is preparing a scene in German of "Peer Gynt" with Hedwiga Richer. Paul Kohner directs.

Lotti Loder was discovered by Darryl Zanuck when she was singing in a Budapest cafe. She sings in German. She is under contract to Warner Brothers and has finished her first film, a short, "The Lonely Gigolo." In this she takes the part of the man as well as that of the girl. Her days are spent in hard study of the English language.

Out of the group of European contestants for a Galveston (Tex.) beauty prize about a year ago, Janina Smolinska remained to attract attention. She is Polish and bears the title of Countess, though she doesn't use it. Her dancing caused her to be featured in the Follies Bergere and her beauty covered magazines and programs. She has been signed by First National for outstanding bits in "Bride of the Regiment" and "Song of the Flame."

One lone girl represents the pride of old Ireland. She is Maureen Sullivan, brought over by Fox for the John McCormack picture

An estimate of the foreign colony residing in Hollywood, numbers it at about 850 with 202 stars and featured players, 551 extras and approximately 100 technicians. In the range of predominance, England ranks foremost, Canada, next, Germany, Russia, France, Austria, Sweden, Italy, Hungary, Japan, Mexico and Denmark.

PUPIL OF FAMOUS SINGERS

Dolores Scott, a talented soprano who, two years ago, at the age of 15, was presented in a professional recital in Chicago, has come to Los Angeles. Dolores was one of the youngest singers ever to be accepted as a pupil by Mme. Schumann-Heink and Herbert Witherspoon.

MISS BRENT APPEARS IN FOREIGN PICTURES

Evelyn Brent has played in motion pictures in several countries. The star began her career in American films, first with the World and later with the Metro company. Then she went to London and became a star in British films. She appeared there in pictures for a period of three years. Her next film work was done for Famous Players-Lasky in Spain, where a company was sent to produce "Spanish Jade." Before returning to America the star made a picture in France and one in Germany.

Sound Makes More Westerns

Demand for talking pictures with outdoor settings has created a popularity for Hoot Gibson productions, according to reports from eastern sales headquarters of the Universal Film Company.

This demand, it is believed, began with the public's acceptance of "In Old Arizona," "The Virginian," "The Cock-Eyed World" and other outdoor stories.

To fill all needs, Gibson is making every picture in two versions, one talkie and one silent.

THIS BILL BOYD A "MENACE"

Stage Actor of Same Name as Film Hero Goes in for Perfidy on Screen

There are two William Boyds in Hollywood. One has been known here as a screen star of the sturdier type, the other has been a stage heavy and leading man for Ethel Barrymore, Maud Adams and others high in the theater's register. Now, with "The Locked Door," William Boyd from the stage joins the ranks of the theatrites gone Hollywood.

Boyd has been a menace nearly all his life, through fate rather than choice. But he is well satisfied with the bad character enforced on him by audiences' and producers' approval. From the East to the West it followed him, and his first talkie now at the United Artists involves him in a murder trial. His second film, finished but not released, dwells on murder and his third, "The Benson Murder Case" on which he is now working with the meticulous Philo Vance, plainly bespeaks its subject.

Only one specification does William Boyd make of a villainous role.

"I must be completely hard or completely bad. If to prove it I must pull little dogs' tails or step on children, I have no objections. That's part of my man. Whether people think me a brute off stage as well as on, I don't care. If I should walk down Hollywood Boulevard and the populace would lean out of windows to hiss me, I think I would take it as a compliment to my work. At least, I would know I was positively bad. What I don't like, and what I won't take, are those villains who wander negligibly and negatively around, never doing anything to substantiate their wickedness, relying on the rest of the cast to point at them and say they are dreadful."

After so many years of dealings with theatrical crime, Mr. Boyd has formed certain generalizations which hold true in the formation or solution by nearly every murder plot.

"If the suspect is a man, the first person to find is the woman. Then, locate her other friend, for there always is one and, so far in my career, I have usually been it. I am always at the wrong end of the triangle, though it has many attractions. Heavies are more interesting to play than heroes, not so much because they are bad, but because they are complicated. A hero, especially if he is in love, is open, unfailingly honest. The villain is trained to deceit. One feels he is hiding something; therefore, he has the allure of mystery. The basis of all villainy is vanity and this vanity often causes a man to cultivate a veneer of charming culture and conversation. Where a hero is too ready with his sincerity, a villain can keep one baffled by polite parrying."

LIEBLING HONORED

The Gamut Club has elected George Liebling as an honorary member after his most interesting speech on "Royal Patrons of Music and the Allied Arts." The pianist-composer was fully equipped to master this theme as he has played on his concert tours in Europe to most of royalty. The Musicians' Guild honored him at their banquet a few days later in a similar way. At this occasion Liebling gave personal reminiscences of Franz Liszt.

In transferring his attentions from the stage to the screen after his appearance here with Helen Menken in "Over the Hill," Boyd offers the candid explanation that he no longer considers the theater the livelihood it has meant. He is a free-lance player, preferring no contracts so that he will be able to accept or reject each script according to his own valuation.

His first big stage role was the hard-hearted character in "The Girl of the Golden West." It took six years playing heavies before he could become a juvenile. Following a few more years as leading man for well-known stars, he again made a hit as a bad man and such he was remained. He has played in "Tenth Avenue," "Within the Law" and was the Capt. Flagg of "What Price Glory." With this background he anticipates a protracted siege of screen perfidy.

Film Workers Good Critics

Motion-picture players do their acting before the most critical and sophisticated of audiences. That is the reaction of Dennis King, Broadway musical stage star, after weeks of work before the film cameras in Paramount's Technicolor song-romance, "The Vagabond King," under Ludwig Berger's direction.

"I had been told that I would miss the audience reaction that I was used to in my stage work," King said. "I have found that to be untrue. The workers on a motion-picture set are a critical and thoroughly sophisticated audience. If an actor can sense a favorable reaction from the cameramen, electricians and others, to whom dramatic scenes are all in the day's work, he knows he is giving a good performance."

Sunday School Lesson

"The International Sunday School Lesson for February 9 is "Warnings and Promises"—Matthew vii:1-29.

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

Lately I have been reading several volumes of excerpts from the wisdom literature of the various oriental nations. As I dug my weary way through chapter after chapter of these oft-lauded eastern gems, I recalled Max Muller's saying that research into the literature of oriental religions yields a few grains of wisdom for a great deal of chaff. My outstanding impression is of the vagueness of it all, and in general of its commonplaceness and reality.

By contrast we have the remarkable definiteness of the teachings of Jesus, as summarized in the Sermon on the Mount, which has furnished the text for three consecutive Sunday-school lessons. Jesus was as explicit as he was profound. The red blood of reality pulses in the arteries of His speech. There is no mistaking what He means in these great passages from Matthew's Gospel. They are not only clear, but they are also luminous. Any child may grasp the meaning of the Master.

MULTUM IN PARVO

Take for example almost at random these sentences from the present lesson; what could be plainer or more explicit or more arresting, and yet more fraught with deeper meaning:

"Ask and it shall be given to you; seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened to you. For it is always he who asks that receives; he who seeks that finds.

"Or what man is there of you who, if his son shall ask of him for a loaf will give him a stone; or if he shall ask for a fish will give him a serpent? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven give good things to them that ask Him?

"All things, therefore, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them."

SOMETHING TO GROW UP TO

Here is a new sort of teacher, telling men how to live the good life; how to find felicity; how to understand God. His principles were put forth as something to be practiced. Mere credal religion gets scant support from the Sermon on the Mount; every paragraph thunders the injunction, "Go and do it!"

By the common consent of the ages the best and most workable law of life is that which Jesus here impacted into the few words colloquially called "The Golden Rule." Confucius once expressed the negative side of the same principle, but that is as near as the world's great thinkers ever got to this guide for everyday living.

It is a favorite verse for children, yet the longer we live and the farther we advance in understanding of life, the more profound and far-reaching this teaching seems. From a formula for childhood's conduct it develops into a business code, and a law of international relationships. There are still undiscovered depths and heights in this single sentence which, as Martin Luther quaintly says, ties up into a little bundle the teachings of the whole Sermon on the Mount. This apothegm is profoundest philosophy made portable. The Golden Rule, supplanting the world's rule of gold, is the way of the golden life.

EUGENISTS ON CLERGY'S CHILDREN

Many men, ministers especially, are finding it hard to keep calm and clear-eyed in the midst of so many new and revolutionary ideas which label themselves as religious. This shock of surprise anud alarm surely cannot come to one who is familiar with the warnings of Jesus Himself, that false prophets would arise. There ever have been such, and there ever will be, deceiving the very elect.

What of it? Jesus gave an infallible test for proving them; the doctrine is to be interpreted by the deed. "By their fruits shall ye know them." One group of teachers in our time are making a lot of noise as they attack the churches, the preachers, the Bible and the Christian religion. Many of the mentally immature are following them, simply because they do not have the good sense, or the scriptural knowledge, to apply the Jesus test of fruits.

Does today's new philosophy make for kindly, friendly living? For personal chastity? For contented homes? For individual industry and loyalty? For patriotism and reverence and spiritual peace? Such questions are answered in the asking; everyone knows that the fruits of our modern and maudlin individualism are quite the contrary.

On the other hand, what are the fruits of even our most imperfect Christianity? I leave the reader to make his own answer; reminding him merely tat an January 9, 1930, in the annual meeting of the American Eugenics Society, which is by no means a particularly pious organization, it was seriously proposed, "as a measure of racial benefit," that there be provided "a special stipend for the rearing of every child born to a clergyman." This measure was advocated because cold statistics have proved that the best quality of leaders arose from the progeny of the clergy. Verily, "By their fruits shall ye know them."

Fantastic Play Declared to be Most Popular

Audiences may sometimes fail to respond to romance and adventure but they are declared to be always thrilled by the fantastic, the weird, the mystic element. Lucien Hubbard's faith in this formula for entertainment is held justified by his success in not only directing but writing the picture version and dialogue for "The Mysterious Island," a Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's spectacular color film, adapted from Jules Verne's underwater fantasy.

"Human nature is incurably fond of speculating on the fantasy of other worlds," declared Hubbard, who is now under contract to Warner Brothers. "Audiences like glimpses of realms which fancy tells us exist beyond our little globe and of creatures who might inhabit other spheres.

"The universal love of fairy lore is an expression of this tendency, and the strain of superstition that runs in all of us more or less, may account for it."

The New in Stores & Homes

Novelties, Ideas, and Suggestions

By OLIVE GRAY

Are we living up to our privileges? Taking advantage of our environment, accepting the gifts offered by our city, by our California? Seeing all that we should see, hearing all that we should hear; reading all that we should read? Are we enjoying our friendships as we should—or do we put off until "tomorrow" the pleasures and benefits which should be ours today? Or, are we bound over to deadly routine——living in a narrow rut—instead of reaching out broadly toward all that should be ours? Let us question ourselves, confidentially, and if possible, remedy our shortcomings, in such circumscription as we find.

Valentine Gifts

Valentine's Day has reached the gift point. So many lovely articles offer themselves giftily for this occasion—who can resist? Not only the lacy cards to send to the little ones, but other objects are displayed which lend hearty co-operation for this thought-kindly date. Heart-shaped dishes for bon-bons, are in china and in glass. Glass, so colorful, so charming to lend a touch to table or boudoir stand, finds happy expression in holding dainties. Boxes, heart-shaped and satin-covered in the inspiring crimson of the era devoted to the love-Saint, come in all sizes.

A new do-up way is shown, also, for these gifts, in that store whose wrap-studio is seventh to none. That diaphanous cellophane cut into multitudes of fluffy streamers, wraps the confection boxes, each streamer having attached to the ends, crimson hearts!

Gift Opportunity

But Valentine gifts need not be confined to the usual. If one possess the gifty-mind, any charming object may find use at this loving-thought time. Little personal luxuries, such as dainty lingerie, handkerchiefs, neckwear, adornments for the home—any, all, may find a place on the Valentine list.

More Ambitious

Of course, the Suitor—let's spell him with a capital!—at least for this important time—will elect to give the more ambitious Valentine remembrance; and he may find an unending number of expedient and appropriate articles for his lady love. If the purpose and the affection thus far extends, he will seek first in the jewel shop for his remembrance. And there he will find—first of all, some precious object, such as a rare jade, fabled to confer luck, upon its possessor. Or something carved from coral, or from carnelian—a pendant or ring, or brooch—since the latter are again in favor. Something romantic, always there has been about a brooch, that preciousness of our forebears.

Gem Handbags

Real gems have found their way into the realm of handbags, some of the finest of these feminine accessories having clasps fashioned from jade, from coral and from carnelian, with motifs to match. One beautiful group, in leading jewelry stores, possess these features, the handbags being fashioned from rare imported tapestries and embroideries, fitting them to associate with the genuine gems with which they were adorned.

Any of these bags would form a charming Valentine gift, from him to her.

Organdy Ornamentation

Tie-backs for bedroom or boudoir curtains are of organdy, fashioned into flowers in pastel tones. These, stretched wreath-style, are delightfully dainty, especially with the filmy voiles and marquisette used for drapery curtains.

Another Curtain Fad

Another window fad, now coming into more general use, is that of using English glaze for shades, the color chosen to correspond with the general scheme of the room, or to harmonize with the window draperies. The effect of light, through these glazed chintzes, is delightful. Many more colors and patterns now are available, than formerly, in this material; and let us add, prices are far less than some time ago.

Women's Shirts

Polo shirts are now chosen by women for sports wear. These shirts come in so many charming colors, the tones softened by the knitted fabric, that almost any suit may be matched or harmonized in the shirts. So pliant is the material from which the garments are woven that the shirts are most wearable for activities of the outdoors; thus exercising another distinct appeal to the sportswoman.

Framing Beauty

Wherever one find beauty, one should make it one's own, treat it respectfully, dote upon it. For beauty, anywhere, is its own justification. I recall that at one time, I framed quite happily, a magazine print, which seemed to be most artistic, and later an art connoisseur, visiting us, paid the picture the compliment of more than a passing look. Some of my Christmas cards I have found worthy of frames.

So-Handy

You can scarcely imagine, if you have not seen it, a sewing machine weighing but a dozen pounds, and equipped with motor, and every utility of a grown-up machine. So small that it fits easily into a carrying case not larger than one holding a phonograph, this little machine is truly a marvel, both in looks, convenience and usefulness. It comes in several colors of enamel, and, when not in use, just houses itself away out of sight. A sewing machine and an umbrella are decidedly cluttery, when not in use; and when needed, are the most needed of any object.

"CARD 13" IS GIVEN PRAISE

ters that mystery stories should not have real people in them. That is all poppycock, fostered by hack mystery writers who couldn't create a character if their lives depended upon it. I suppose Sherlock Holmes was a stuffed shirt!

"Card 13" is full of good characters. Even some of the minor people are excellent. Dolly's husband, the disillusioned broker, has one brief scene, but lingers in the mind. Then there is the footman of the star, himself a former extra in the pictures, who dares to be human out of the corner of his mouth. The famous criminal lawyer is an amusing figure. Ida and Dolly are well done, and so is the sly little hotel clerk who gives himself away in a few sentences. Of the major characters, readers will probably be most interested in Selma, the big star who traveled from the Lower East Side to the highest Hollywood hill. The scene where Selma fights her old rival in the dark, with her footman holding her firmly about the waist and screaming: "Look out for her teeth!" is a charming portrait of a lady in action.

You will gather that the picture of Hollywood is not a flattering one. But no doubt all this happened in the dark days before the talkies came and the little infant industry grew up. It is rumored that they sit at home of nights now—the picture people do. They gargle—but not with gin. Like the West of song and story, the old Hollywood is fading.

Its characters, its setting, and its striking solution should insure for "Card 13" a wide popularity. Take my case for instance—if you don't mind. The book was written by a fellow-novelist—and a critic. And still I like it.

IGNORANCE IS ROOT OF EVIL

plications in England's existence but also the extent and nature of the Imperial interests. Not one American in a hundred appreciates the importance of India to the Empire, nor knows how much the English have done in exchange for the benefits which they have derived from India during the past century. Most Americans are ignorant of the fact that at the same time that England has profited from her China trade she has been a great factor in the modernization of that country and, through the concessions (foreign cities) which she controls has given protection to hundreds of thousands of Chinese refugees and has brought them prosperity." Here he raises the most controversial question of the age, one on which not even a distinguished member of the Roosevelt family and an editor of the New York Times is competent to lay down the law. For there are those who put human liberty before prosperity, freedom to develop in their own way above any protection or safeguards that can be offered a subject people.

bodies of their troops; that the balance between victory and defeat turns on mental impressions and only indirectly on physical blows. It was the shock of being surprised and the feeling that he was powerless to counter potential strategic moves which shook Ludendorff's nerve more than the loss of prisoners, guns and acreage."

Dr. Isaac Goldberg, literary editor of the American Freeman, and author of "The Man Mencken" and "The Story of Gilbert and Sullivan," deals with an entirely different theme from anything he has ever done in his new book "The Fine Art of Living" (An Esthetic Approach to Life and the Arts) which the Stratford Company publish. Havelock Ellis has accepted the dedication of "The Fine Art of Living."

"Choice Candy Recipes," by Lucy G. Allen, is a collection calculated to delight the epicure. There are careful and exact directions for making every sort of candy; cocoanut violets, Neapolitan mints, caramel Pecan balls, chocolate dips, strawberries dipped in fondant, etc.

Storm Jameson, noted English author of "The Voyage Home," published by Alfred A. Knopf, comes of a family which has been allied with the shipbuilding industry for generations. Miss Jameson admits that if she had been a boy she would have gone into shipping, too, but instead she writes novels about ships and seafaring men and women.

TIBBETT HERE FOR CONCERT

rumors to the contrary notwithstanding. It certainly will not be "The Girl of the Golden West," the opera which he greatly aided in a successful revival at the Metropolitan this season, for another studio has bought the rights and may not even use the Puccini score.

Having the true actor's eagerness for character study, he prays for widely different roles so that he may grow in his art and not be arrested by success. Too many motion-picture stars have been caught in the mesh of a one-type role and sent forth to the public in repetition after repetition because their first picture scored at the box office.

This passion for playing many roles has been with Tibbett since childhood and it is part of his creed that ambitious dreams of one's youth, if protected and held close through the years, are the creative powers which bring realization to the individual man. Certainly Tibbett's own life has proven the truth of this idea for he has consistently carried his dreams through to fruition and he still has several more dreams up his sleeve, or wherever it is that he keeps them.

Many of these dreams have been realized through the effective aid of his devoted managerial wife, Grace Tibbett. Mrs. Tibbett is known as a poet to the world and a book of charming verses, most of them about her husband, has recently been published. Frank La Forge has set a lovely one to music and it is to be sung for the first time at Tibbett's concert here, the new picture for Tibbett, all

"BAMBINA" TO BE GIVEN AT MAYAN TOMORROW

Los Angeles theatergoers have long awaited the gala opening of "Bambina" at the Mayan tomorrow night. Not only is the play itself of unusual interest, being a West Coast production, but, also, it brings to the city the first West Coast work of Edward Royce, noted stage director.

Royce's roster of produced plays names "Sally" "Irene," "Kid Boots," and "Rio Rita," to gauge the caliber of the director who has created "Bambina," and there are more than 200 other stage efforts, many of which, it is said, have been equally as big successes in their day as those specifically mentioned. Perhaps it might be well to remark that Royce is the director who gave the theater the original "Merry Widow" on the continent long before it reached American shores. He also was associated with the Gilbert and Sullivan operas, which were staged at the old Savoy Theater in London.

"Bambina" will have an all-star cast—Nancy Welford cofeatured with Al St. John, and a group of capable and familiar players. Among these are Marie Wells, Ernest Wood, Wilbur Evans, Russell Scott, Hedley Hall, Fred Walton, Peter Pope and others.

EDITING MUSICAL FILM

"The Vagabond King," the musical film adaptation of the stage success of the same name, is now in the cutting rooms at the Paramount studios in Hollywood. This vehicle, which stars Dennis King, was filmed entirely in Technicolor.

Use Powder
Cleans Teeth as Nothing Else Can

For Cleaner, Whiter Teeth . . . do as your dentist does, when he cleans your teeth—use POWDER

There is nothing known that will clean and polish teeth so quickly and leave them so gleaming white—as POWDER.

Science has found nothing to take its place.

That is why your dentist, when cleaning your teeth, as you know—always uses powder.

As it is only the powder part of any dentifrice that cleans, a dentifrice that is ALL POWDER just naturally cleans best.

Dr. Lyon's Tooth Powder IS ALL POWDER—100% cleansing properties. This is more than twice the cleansing properties of tooth pastes.

Dull Teeth Become White

For over SIXTY YEARS, dentists everywhere, have prescribed Dr. Lyon's Tooth Powder, because—teeth . . . simply cannot . . . remain dull and film coated when it is used.

It cleans off all stains and tartar, and polishes the teeth in a harmless and practical way that leaves them sparkling—many shades whiter.

No Glycerine—No Grit

Being an ALL POWDER dentifrice, Dr. Lyon's contains no glycerine, therefore does not soften the gums. It is free from all grit or pumice and cannot possibly scratch, or injure, the softest enamel, as years of constant use have shown.

Dr. Lyon's is the only dentifrice old enough to prove it can be safely used for life.

Neutralizes Acids

In addition to cleansing, it is probably the greatest neutralizer known for ACID MOUTH, being many times more effective than Milk of Magnesia.

Dr. Lyon's Tooth Powder keeps your teeth REALLY CLEAN and clean teeth mean—firm, healthy gums, freedom from pyorrhea and the least possible tooth decay.

Brush your teeth with Dr. Lyon's regularly—consult your dentist periodically—and you will be doing ALL that you can possibly do, to protect your teeth.

Lasts Longer—Costs Less

Once you use Dr. Lyon's Tooth Powder, you will never be satisfied to use anything else. It leaves your teeth feeling so much cleaner, your mouth so refreshed, and your breath so sweet and pure.

Dr. Lyon's is not only doubly efficient, but it costs . . . only half as much . . . to use. Even a small package lasts twice as long as a tube of tooth paste.

In use over 60 years

"Beauty Shampoo" in 10 minutes

Quickly, Easily, at a few cents cost—you can have a Real "Beauty Shampoo" that will give Your Hair a Loveliness, quite unobtainable by Ordinary Washing.

YOU CAN SAVE TIME, expense and inconvenience, by adopting this simple method of "beauty shampooing" which gives truly professional results at home.

The beauty of your hair, its sparkle . . . its gloss and lustre . . . depends, almost entirely, upon the way you shampoo it.

A thin, oily film, or coating, is constantly forming on the hair. If allowed to remain, it catches the dust and dirt—hides the life and lustre—and the hair then becomes dull and unattractive.

Two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a glass or pitcher with a little warm water added, makes an abundance of . . . soft, rich, creamy lather . . . which cleanses thoroughly and rinses out easily, removing with it every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.

Only thorough shampooing will remove this film . . . and let the sparkle, and rich, natural . . . tones . . . of the hair show.

Ordinary washing fails to satisfactorily remove this film, because it does not clean the hair properly.

Besides—the hair cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali, in ordinary soaps, quickly dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why women, by the thousands, who value beautiful hair, are using Mulsified Cocoanut Oil Shampoo. It cleanses so thoroughly; is entirely mild and so pure, that it cannot possibly injure, no matter how often you use it.

You will notice the difference in the appearance of your hair the very first time you use Mulsified, for it will be so delightfully clean, and be so soft, silky, and fresh-looking.

Try a Mulsified "Beauty Shampoo" and just see how quickly it is done. See how easy your hair is to manage, and how lovely and alluring it will look. See it sparkle—with new life, gloss and lustre.

You can get Mulsified Cocoanut Oil Shampoo at any drug store, or toilet goods counter, . . . anywhere in the world.

Cuticura Healed Red Eruptions on Four Months Old Baby.

"My little girl started to have small, sore eruptions on her cheeks when she was four months old. They kept getting worse and worse, and later the eruptions scaled over and were red and feverish. The trouble lasted about a month.

"I read an advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment and sent for a free sample. It seemed to help her right away so I purchased more, and after using two cakes of Cuticura Soap and one box of Cuticura Ointment she was completely healed." THE GRANULATED HARD-WATER SOAP

And you don't need any softener, either! This way saves the clothes because there's no boiling or scrubbing. I choose Rinso every time—for the wash, for the dishes and for all cleaning!"

MRS. W. W. ROSS,

In tub washing Rinso is a great work-saver. It makes clothes whiter than they can be scrubbed. How that saves the clothes! Hands, too.

Only thorough shampooing will ... remove this film . . . and let the sparkle, and rich, natural . . . color tones . . . of the hair show.

Ordinary washing fails to satisfactorily remove this film, because—it does not clean the hair properly.

Besides—the hair cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali, in ordinary soaps, soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why women, by the thousands, who value beautiful hair, are using Mulsified Cocoanut Oil Shampoo. It cleanses so thoroughly; is so mild and so pure, that it cannot possibly injure, no matter how often you use it.

You will notice the difference in the appearance of your hair the very first time you use Mulsified, for it will feel so delightfully clean, and be so soft, silky, and fresh-looking.

Try a Mulsified "Beauty Shampoo" and just see how quickly it is done, how easy your hair is to manage, and how lovely and alluring it will look. See it sparkle—with new life, gloss and lustre.

You can get Mulsified Cocoanut Oil Shampoo at any drug store, or toilet goods counter, . . . anywhere in the world.

SIMPLICITY WILL MARK SHOE STYLES

Women's Spring Footwear to be Shown in Linen Materials

Linen materials of all colors to harmonize with women's costumes will predominate in the spring display of women's footwear, announces Fred E. White, president of Wolfelt-White Company, upon his return from a spring buying visit to New York. Simplicity is the keynote of spring styles with the inherent beauty of their design varying only according to the charm of their creative mode.

"An innovation this year," said Mr. White, "which has met with the hearty indorsement of dealers everywhere is the introduction of successful dyeing of buck materials and its offering in a rainbow of hues to equal the display of linens. Trims are simple and very smart in design and are intended to express the extreme elegance that meticulous care in their selection reflects.

NOVELIST COINS PICTUARY TERM

ure and when they no longer do so they are discarded. Pictures that are dead ought to be burnt.

The idea is a thrilling one and deserves all the encouragement that artists can give it. It holds the possibility of doing away with much of the snobbery and hypocrisy that at present mars the advertising and selling of pictures. Artists today, who have established the property value of their wares, resent any honest criticism because it tends to injure that value. But if art were rentable and returnable, the artist receiving a royalty, the stir would be far clearer.

CITIES SHOULD AID

And has the sale of books suffered from the establishment of public libraries? Not at all. Book stores never flourished as they do now. Why then should the outright sale of art suffer? Mr. Lawrence did not go far enough with his idea. A. B. Dodge, manager of The Times art department and president of the Printmakers' Society of California, jumped right through to the ultimate goal. "Picturaries," said Mr. Dodge, "should be a branch of the municipality, just as libraries are. Visual works of art are just as vital to the understanding and enjoyment of civilized life as are libraries. People need to experience original art just as much as they need music and literature. They are not getting it because they cannot afford to own it. Let the pictuary rent or loan it to them."

"Sun-Up" Role Played for Seven Years

True art is not only universal. It is immortal. A direct illustration of the fact is the deathlessness of the theater, a well-known institution of 3000 years standing whose venerable traditions even talkies have failed to squelch.

So it is the most natural thing in the world for one of the great character actresses to return by popular demand to Los Angeles in a play which ran here twenty-eight weeks to capacity houses three years ago. Only histrionism like that which Lucille La Verne gives to "Sun-Up" could continue to bring freshness and originality to a role which she has played for seven years. Two continents acclaim Lucille La Verne as the Widow Cagle. The starkness and dominance with which she verifies the role make her a vital figure in contemporary drama.

The Vine Street Theater has been fortunate in securing, it is said, with Miss La Verne, the same cast which supported her abroad.

SUGAR and SPICE
by Alma Whitaker

"THIS PARTICULAR SORORITY, THEY CLAIM, HARBORS THE GIRLS THAT DO THINGS!"

"LOIS WEBER HAS FINALLY TAKEN OVER THAT HUGE APARTMENT HOUSE, THE PARK LANE."

ALL sorts of emotions were stirring when the alumnae of the Gamma Phi Beta Sorority held their 300-strong bridge-tea in the grand new chapter house at the U. C. L. A. campus last Saturday.

There were the proud and expectant youthful active members, bubbling with the joie de vivre; there were the young married alumnae feeling alarmingly grown-up; there were the successful ones, competent in careers, and just a sprinkling of the oldest ones, whose memories were flooding fast upon them.

This particular sorority, they claim harbors the girls "that do things," rather than those of mere social aspirations . . . hence they were "pointing with pride" to such satisfying alumnae as Miss Barbara Greenwood, nationally known as the pioneer of the nursery schools, and now guiding the one at U. C. L. A. to triumph; to Mrs. John Davidson, pretty, chic, alert, literary chairman of the Friday Morning Club, making quite a name for herself as a book reviewer, the mother of two adorable small boys, and a collector of celebrated book plates; and to Nell Brooker Mayhew, the artist, the first to simplify the coloring of etchings, whose exquisite work is now being exhibited at the Palos Verdes Art Gallery. They there is Gail Hall Wright, who has become an advertising expert, and, with her clever mother, has just completed a novel, with advertising as the theme.

Miss Hazel Plate is a fairy-god-mother to the chapter. She, clever girl, is still in her early thirties and the stock market. She put herself the stockmarket. She put herself through school, took herself around the world, owns a charming home and cars, and has proved a precious aid in the building and furnishing of the new chapter house on the campus.

Martha Burnham, grand-daughter of the famous explorer, is an active member of this chapter . . . recently returned from that marvelous trip with her grand-dad via Australia and South Africa. Three clever artists are Mrs. Carl Smith, of the university art department and international lecturer on this subject; Virginia Evans, who is still a student, and Edna Gearhart of Pasadena. Musicians to bring the chapter eclat are Margaret Schirm and Kate Frost. One youngster I expect to become famous is Damarith Smith, one of the youthful students in the house, whose sparkling intelligent eyes promise all sorts of triumphs.

Lois Weber, distinguished for so long as the only woman motion-picture director, and who is also a writer of note, has finally taken over that huge apartment-house, the Park Lane, in which she has so much money invested, herself. So the occasion was celebrated with a big party last week, Capt. Gantz her popular ranching spouse, being on hand as mine host. Scores of motion-picture friends dropped in to wish them luck in this new venture.

Free guest cards to Paradise! One finds them on one's automobile seat any old day now . . . you know, popped in while they are parked. And signed with a personal flourish by Noah Beery!

Wherefore you may have guessed it is an entree to Beery's Trout Club . . . once suspected of being quite exclusive, ahem. One rather gathers that Mr. Beery is going in for democracy on a large scale now . . . anyone that has the price. "Paradise" is the largest type on the card . . . printed in flaming red. Noah, dear, it ought to be a true-blue paradise, or at least a golden paradise, don't you think? And Noah, were you particular about which sort of cars the guest cards were popped into? It might make a difference.

Arthur W. Connable, who has an attractive wife, who doesn't like bridge has, at his own expense, and strictly for love of the game, written and had printed a pamphlet suggesting important changes in the laws of auction.

Mr. Connable, you see, takes his bridge very seriously . . . insisting that it is essentially a game for the "intellectual and the sportsman" . . . and one of his reforms calls for "individual responsibility" . . . no warnings from partners, ever. There are seventeen pages of suggested changes altogether . . . mostly increasing the good sportsmanship of the rules . . . for instance, any opponent should be permited to ask a doubler whether his bid is "informative or business," if he does so before the next hand declares.

These suggestions have been sent to the Whist Club of New York, regarding as the ruling authority on the game in this country.

Except from a leter to this department: "A year ago Miss Hazel Banks, graduate of Poly and teacher in the Los Angeles schools for eighteen years, proposed to Alumni Association the plan to create a John H. Francis Scholarship fund. They promised to take it up but did nothing. Now comes this move to spend $2000 for a bust. I suppose a scholarship fund means too much time as well as money . . . But if St. Louis can get along without a bust of Lindbergh, Poly High should be able to exist without one of Mr. Francis . . . I can't see what benefit that bust would be to anyone except the one who makes it . . . and I am an old grad, too."

It's bad psychology as advertising. A certain cafe issues a joke permit, for wives to sign, beginning "This is to certify that I . . . the legally wedded wife of . . . do hereby permit my husband to go where he pleases, drink what he pleases and when he pleases . . . and to keep and enjoy the company of any lady or ladies he sees fit," etc.

It is taking an unwise chance on the average feminine sense of humor. Likewise it starts them thinking. Nothing so dangerous as starting wives thinking. And one can never be sure which point of a joke a wife will elect to see. She has an awkward knack of seeing a totally new angle to that sort of a joke.

This new local branch of the National Plant, Flower and Fruit Guild has certinly roped in a large number of our distingue citizens. Mrs. John D. Fredericks, Mrs. Seeley Mudd, Mrs. Alonso Bell, Mrs. Antonio Moreno, Mrs. Allan Balch, Mary Pickford, Mrs. Sherman Hoyt, Dr. Rufus Von KleinSmid, Mrs. E. B. Rivers, Mrs. Dean Mason and so on down a mighty list. It entails any amount of hard work, extreme generosity . . . and time, time, time. Daisy Moreno, for instance, sent out hundreds of personally signed letters. Ellen Andrews has taken on an exacting secretarial job. Henry O'Melveny and Dr. W. L. Hardin, as the honorary and active presidents, are expected to work their heads off. Queen Boardman gives time, money and service galore . . . and all in order that the less fortunate without gardens of their own, shall receive free cut flowers, bulbs, seeds, etc.

Dr. George Clements of the Chamber of Commerce (the fellow who made us all grow beans and potatoes during the war) probably hit upon the secret when he said the guild offered opportunity for individual and direct service in charity. You see, the Community Chest has taken all the glamour out of benevolence and put it on such a practical nonpersonal contact basis (canned charity, as it were) that the nicer souls among us are seeking elsewhere for avenues of direct benevolence and real contacts.

"NOAH, DEAR, IT OUGAT TO BE A TRUE-BLUE PARADISE, DON'T YOU THINK?"

Philadelphia Home City of Stars in Play

Philadelphia, the city of Quakers and brotherly love, seems to abound in the producing of comedians. An instance of this is El Brendel, the inimitable Swedish dialect fun-maker, and Frank Richardson, both of whom score success with Janet Gaynor and Charles Farrell in "Sunny Side Up," which is now having its first popular run showing at the Boulevard Theater.

Both of these comedians are natives of Philadelphia, and made their first appearances there. El (short for Elmer,) Brendel ran away from home and school to join a medicine show, while Richardson, under parental guidance, made his singing debut at the age of 8 years, and has been at it ever since.

Many people are under the impression that Brendel is a native-born Swede. It is a compliment to his dialect ability, but according to El, he was a former German dialect comedian until the war frowned upon that type of entertainment. It was difficult at first, but now it is nothing unusual for him to be greeted with a "Skoal" by native Norsemen.

With Richardson, both vaudeville and master of ceremony positions were his forte until the talking screen came along. His "Walking With Susie" number in the Fox Follies is still talked about.

ORGAN RECITAL TODAY

WANTED—HELP—Male

Salesmen, Solicitors —10-B

Are You The Type That Can Handle A Real Job Paying $8,000 To $15,000 Per Year?

There are a great many who can but only a few who do. Are you one who can and yet don't?

Let this man tell his story: "My name is Wirick. I was a hospital helper and had never sold anything. I made $100 my first week, $200 the second week, and my third week my check is $274.12. Many other men in the organization have more remarkable records than I. However, I hope to aspire to get the checks that my fellow salesmen are getting. I aim to make what Mr. Trainers makes, as his checks run more than 100% higher than mine. He has been with the company two or three weeks longer than I, and neither of us have been with the company two months."

As DIRECTOR OF SALES of one of the largest distributing companies in the country, I often have an opening in my staff for a position which will pay $15,000 a year, depending upon the caliber of the man. My trouble is not finding the man who is worth this amount to me, as there are many, because the very qualifications I require of me make you eligible, is honesty, enthusiasm, determination to work hard, and to be able to make the transfer of large sums of money accurately.

I want a man who, if I made him $25,000 during the next year, his personal nature will not change. He will be no different than when he was making $1500 a year.

Make me prove to you that I have taken men and women earning less than $50 a week, and put them in the $1000 class.

If you qualify, can you keep your head if I make it possible for you to earn this amount?

Sales experience is not essential and you are eligible even if your past salary has been small.

Don't try to analyze yourself, as we are all too charitable with our faults. Come in and see me and I will tell you what it's all about and whether you can take over these duties.

I Also Have A Few Other Openings

Which might interest you, as they can earn more than the average salary.

A MAN

I am looking for the Man who wants to outlive—not with $ 500, $1000 position that pays $10,000 a year or better.

If you would like an opportunity where you can make from $100 to $400 a week, attend this meeting.

I have some most interesting things to tell to Men who have been fortunate enough to be received by me. To tell you that these men have had their earning power changed from $50 to $100 a week to $1000 a week, you possibly would not believe it. A photographic reproduction; however, a square look into these men's eyes, will convince you at a glance that the plan I have will shift you right into the $10,000 a year class.

The man who answers this advertisement must have personality and determination plus that quality that makes a REAL man.

A SALES REPRESENTATIVE WITH A RECORD OF REAL ACHIEVEMENT

to care for his growing clientele, an established and reputable personal service corporation—the largest of its kind on the Pacific Coast—is about to add to its staff one and possibly three sales representatives for local office.

And for Orange, Riverside and San Bernardino counties.

The term "representative" is used advisedly, for the man or men selected must be REPRESENTATIVES in every sense of the word — in character, sales caliber and appearance—men who can get to the very best type of people and after getting to them talk their language—impress them.

The affiliation offered is not only a most distinct and especial one, but an exceptionally lucrative one. The earnings of the right man should be very quickly at the rate of not less than $10,000 a year. The earnings of one of our force is at the rate of more than $1000 a month.

This is not to be classed with the general run of an insurance salesman. It is in every sense an exceptional opportunity worthy of the investigation of the most ambitious type of men.

If you are of this class, willing to follow instructions and able to finance yourself, phone PA. 1041 for appointment. Ask for Mr. Rogers.

FIRE DEATH PLOT BELIEF ABANDONED

Officers Give Up Theories That Little Girl Lost Her Life in "Revenge Blaze"

An early fear that a fire in which Eva Gonzales, 7 years of age, was burned to death early yesterday, may have been of incendiary origin in a revenge attempt was virtually abandoned by Detective Lieutenants Romero and Torre yesterday after questioning a dozen or so Mexicans who live in the vicinity of the fire.

Information received by the officers indicated that a feud had existed for months among several Mexican families living at 341½ Quier street and the arson theory was considered when Manuel Delgado reported that he had been attacked by the mother of the child. Delgado told Capt. Cato of the Central homicide squad that he had gone to see Mrs. Gonzales to demand a retraction of asserted gossip concerning him. Her reply, he said, was to attack him with a hammer.

The fire in which the child lost her life occurred a few hours later and Delgado was questioned. The charred body was found in the ruins by Officer Anthony.

MacMILLAN OPTIMISTIC OVER BYRD

Arctic Explorer Sailing to Hawaii Thinks Party Will Cheat Ice, All Right

Donald B. MacMillan, Arctic explorer, will make a four months' cruise in his eighty-foot boat Bowdoin to Iceland, Greenland, Labrador and Baffin Land this summer in quest of Norseman history, he announced yesterday before sailing on the Lasco liner City of Honolulu for Hawaii with a friend, Edward Martin, of Boston.

He is particularly anxious to be in Iceland during the celebration of the 1000th anniversary of parliamentary government, the oldest in existence, he declared. He will start from his home at Provideness, Mass., in June.

The explorer, who has been in the Arctics nineteen years of the last twenty-one, has no qualms for Admiral Byrd's safety, whom he allows at least two more months in which to get out of the Antarctic.

"Even so, walrus and seal meat aren't so bad if they had to remain over," he said. "We had provisions for two years but were frozen in twice as long, yet we still had supplies and forty-eight walrus and eighty-four seals packed away for another winter if necessary."

JOINT CHAMBER MEETING HELD

Yucaipa and Calimesa Body in Annual Turkey Dinner

Plans Made for Great Year Throughout Valley

Poultry Center, Cannery and Hotel Sought

YUCAIPA, Feb. 1.—Yucaipa and Calimesa chambers of commerce entertained more than 200 San Bernardino Valley men tonight at their annual turkey dinner. R. Sheppard, president of the combined chambers, presided and talks were made by Roy Mack of San Bernardino, Al Priddy and others. The address of welcome was given by E. Carter and plans were made for a great year for the valley. In his talk Carter said in part:

"During the year just passed the chamber has not done all that it could have accomplished if it had been given more support by its members. We will admit that. In 1928 your chamber made great headway. It selected a definite program; it adopted a budget, and the necessary action taken to secure funds to carry out that program and I remember how actively and earnestly some of your members worked to insure its success. Especially H. M. Holmes, J. W. Crilly and others. But last year we were not so energetic.

"However, for the year 1930 we can resolve to make it the best in our history. It can be done. You know there are many industries which are looking for a place to locate, but you will have to go get them. I mean a poultry center, a large cannery, a large modern hotel and recreation resort and the chamber in this community, like many others, is the only business office it possesses. The stranger, the prospective land buyer and home seeker, business man or manufacturer, invariably seeks the Chamber of Commerce for information regarding the community. That's why it should have for its secretary the best man the community can find. For if its information is incomplete or untrue, not only this particular chamber is injured but every other one."

Committee to Award Noble Prize Named

PASADENA, Feb. 1.—This city's most useful citizen during 1929, who will receive the annual Arthur Noble award, will be named within a few weeks by a committee appointed today by Robert L. Daugherty, chairman of the Board of City Directors.

Members of the committee who will select the 1929 Noble prize winner are I. Blair Evans, chairman; Mrs. W. D. Crocker, William H. Mage, Charles R. Seward and Dr. Merle N. Smith.

Last year the award was made to Hiram W. Wadsworth on the basis of his work in the interests of the Colorado River water project. Two years ago, Dr. George Ellery Hale, director emeritus of the Carnegie Solar Observatory, Mt. Wilson, received the medal, and the previous year, the higher honor went to Myron Hunt, architect for the Public Library.

The first recipient of the Noble award was Gilmor Brown, director of the Pasadena Community Playhouse, in recognition of his services in establishing one of the first successful community theaters in this city.

Alfred Edwards Estate Settled

SANTA BARBARA, Feb. 1.—Settlement of the estate of Alfred Edwards, who died about four years ago, valued at more than $250,000, and which has been the source of litigation between the widow and the four children during the past three years, was amicably settled in Superior Court today.

The disagreement between the heirs arose over what portion comprised community and what portion separate property. It was Mrs. Edwards's contention that all of the estate, except some $80,000 in stocks, was community property, while the children contended the entire estate was separate property.

Under the agreement, Mrs. Edwards is to receive $62,500 in cash and one-half the income of the remainder. The children are to receive the other half of the income. The four children are Alfred R. Edwards, Mrs. Elizabeth Jones, Raymond and John Edwards.

John W. Heaney and Atwell Westwick of the law firm of Heaney, Price & Postel, represented the executor and trustee, the Security First National Bank.

OFFICERS INSTALLED BY COMMERCE BODY

INGLEWOOD, Feb. 1.—The annual meeting and installation of officers of the local Chamber of Commerce was held here last evening and was attended by 150 local residents. Sam M. Greene, president of the Bank of Inglewood and a director in the chamber, acted as toastmaster. The meeting was held jointly with Post 188, American Legion, and was opened by Commander James C. Cortner of the post. J. A. H. Kerr, vice-president of the Los Angeles chamber, was the speaker of the evening, taking as his subject "The Economic Value of a Chamber of Commerce." Kerr also installed the board. They are: A. E. Chamberlain, president; Louis E. Hardin, Jr., vice-president; John L. Steinbarger, treasurer, and W. G. Brown, E. M. Mansur, Frank D. Parent, George C. Mallow and Carl Matson.

TWO AWAIT EXTRADITION

Men Charged With Murdering Tia Juana Man and Wounding Wife, Held for Mexican Government

SAN DIEGO, Feb. 1.—Charged with the murder of Francisco Guzman, Tia Juana rancher and resort operator, on December 28, Pacifico Garcia and Howard Radcliff were arraigned before United States Commissioner Henry C. Ryan today and lodged in the County Jail pending extradition to the District of Zaragoza, Baja California, where, as asserted fugitives from justice, the two are wanted by the Mexican government for prosecution on a charge of murder. Garcia, a Filipino, and Radcliff, alias Arthur Haleaday, were arrested at Oceanside December 30, by Deputy Sheriff Charles Goss.

Felipe De La Garma, District Attorney of the Judicial District of Zaragoza, appeared before Commissioner Ryan requesting the extradition of the two. Following the arraignment, Commissioner Ryan certified the evidence of criminality and of the commission of the crime to the Secretary of State. The crime of murder is one of the offenses provided for and enumerated in the treaty and convention for the extradition of criminals, executed between the government of Mexico and the government of the United States on February 22, 1899, Judge Ryan said.

The killing of Guzman has been termed the "four-bit murder," and took place on the Rancho Nayarit, about four miles south of Tia Juana. Garcia and Radcliff are asserted to have gone to Tia Juana on the day of the killing, December 28, last, and to have sat at one of the tables which Guzman and his wife had for the purpose of renting to persons desiring to use them. As the customers prepared to depart, Guzman's wife requested 50 cents, Mexican money, for the rental of the table, it is said. Whereupon, it is declared in the complaint, the two defendants drew pistols and began firing upon Guzman and his wife, killing Guzman and wounding his wife. Shortly after the arrest of Garcia and Radcliff by Deputy Sheriff Goss of Oceanside, Sheriff Ed Cooper was given a fugitive warrant by Mexican authorities to hold the suspects in the County Jail here pending Federal action.

WINE TONIC ORDINANCE ENJOINED

Victorville Merchant Gets Temporary Restraining Order on Enforcement

SAN BERNARDINO, Feb. 1.—Enforcement of San Bernardino county's "bottle-a-day" wine-tonic ordinance was temporarily blocked today when Superior Judge F. A. Leonard signed an order restraining Sheriff Walter A. Shay and Dist.-Atty. George N. Johnson from arresting C. O. Hildebrand of Victorville pending a hearing on Hildebrand's petition for a permanent injunction.

Hildebrand, who operates a mercantile store, asserts in his petition that the law which restricts the sale of tonics and bitters to drug stores is discriminatory and, therefore, unconstitutional.

Specifically, Hildebrand asks that the Sheriff and District Attorney be restrained from interfering with his sale of a patented bitters which he sold in bottles from his mercantile store in Victorville before the "wine-tonic" ordinance was adopted. The bitters, he states, are and have long been known as a household remedy. If he is successful in establishing that the ordinance is discriminatory and consequently unconstitutional, the permanent injunction will be issued blocking the enforcement of the ordinance throughout the county.

The ordinance is effective only in the unincorporated area of the county. Under the terms of the law only adults can purchase either wine tonics or bitters of any description and then only in twenty-four-ounce bottles. The restricting of the sale to one bottle daily was made after the manufacturers contended before the Supervisors that their products were health products and not beverages.

Collegians Will Try for Honors in Versifying

CLAREMONT, Feb. 1.—Editors of "First the Blade," the intercollegiate anthology of poetry, to be published this year by Scripps College, are this week calling upon students of seventy-five colleges of California for their best verse. The Crombie Allen prizes and the Redlands Round Table prizes, totaling $75, are offered for the best poems submitted. Honorable mention will be awarded to the college whose students make the most outstanding contribution.

The anthology is published each year by a college chosen to represent the Intercollegiate Fellowship of Creative Art, Fullerton Junior College, founder of the association and editor of the first volume of the series, remains president of the society. The second volume, published last year by Redlands University, contained poems by students in twenty-nine colleges.

The judges of the contest will be R. W. Borst, Fullerton Junior College; Miss Edith R. Mirrielees, Stanford University; Elliott C. Lincoln, Pomona College, and Glenn Hughes, Scripps College.

Students of college standing in any California institution are eligible to submit poems, which should be in the hands of the editors before the 22nd inst.

The editors this year are Caroline Bennett, Jane Brandenstein and Mary Fischer of Scripps College. Prof. William S. Ament is adviser.

Santa Barbara Bans Magazines

SANTA BARBARA, Feb. 1. — A list of names of questionable magazines ordered banned recently by Chief of Police George Sloan was delivered to owners of local newsstands today. The campaign to eliminate the sale of the magazines by the news-stands originated with a request from the chairman of Juvenile Protection and the P.-T.A. Council. The communication to police said in part:

"We have in Santa Barbara an unusually high-class group of merchants. A large number of them have already been practicing careful discrimination in the quality of goods sold. We wish to appeal to the entire group of merchants, asking their co-operation in making it impossible for our boys and girls to purchase reading material with suggestive appeal."

WATER DISTRICT VOTE FAILS

GARDENA, Feb. 1.—A proposal to establish a county water district here in place of the privately owned service failed to carry in a special election held yesterday. The contest was one of the closest ever recorded here, the vote being 540 against the proposal, and 538 in favor of it.

Kind Hearts in City Give Burial to Two Sisters

SAN BERNARDINO, Feb. 1.—Claimed by the community as its own, Dorothy and May Tomlinson, sisters, who died of deadly monoxide gas as they slept in an automobile camp near Fontana three weeks ago, were buried today after impressive funeral services arranged by kind-hearted residents who acted to save the girls from unmarked graves in the potter's field.

Two ministers, the Rev. J. C. Carmichael and Golder I. Lawrence, officiated. Mrs. W. J. McCarthy sang and the two caskets donated by J. W. Woodhouse, undertaker, were banked with flowers. More than 200 people attended the services. The burial lots were donated by the Mountain View Cemetery directors.

It had not been definitely established that the girls, who told motorists along the highway that they were from New Orleans, were orphans, but no one claimed the bodies, and when it appeared that they would be buried without even a prayer, the community answered by arranging the services. The girls were "hitch-hiking" across the country. At Fontana, where they arrived cold and weary, a kindly motorist rented them a cabin in the automobile camp. The girls retired with the open gas heater burning full blast. Their bodies were found on the following day.

Suit Expected in Widening Plan

UPLAND, Feb. 1.—Shortly after Thursday when the Council meets condemnation proceedings are expected to be started against property owners along Foothill Boulevard within city limits.

The move is termed a "friendly condemnation suit" in order to get Foothill Boulevard widened in the city to correspond with the wider boulevard east and west of here.

In order to carry out the project it will be necessary to move several homes and buildings farther back for the widening. The State will bear this expense, it was announced at a meeting of the City Council with officials and property owners last night. The State will also stand the expense of removing a number of orange trees.

None of the expense of widening the highway will be assessed against the property owners, the latter were assured.

At Thursday's meeting of the City Council final orders for the work are expected to be issued.

HIGHWAYS WATCHED FOR HIT-RUN DRIVER

ONTARIO, Feb. 1.—Highways were watched here this afternoon in order to halt a group of men riding in an automobile who had figured in a crash with a car filed with Mexicans in West A street. The car plowed into the Mexican-laden automobile, turned it over and practically demolished it. None of the Mexicans received critical injuries, but the driver of the other auto sped swiftly from the scene without stopping to learn the extent of their injuries.

GARDENA, Feb. 1.—Radio's strains drowned all sounds of a hold-up which was reported yesterday to the Sheriff's office. An armed man held up R. O. Richards in the latter's grocery at 1428 Market street, here, on Friday night, while Mrs. Richards was tuning in on a lively program. After the bandit had forced Richards to hand over $32 from the cash register, he locked the grocer and his wife in a living-room at the rear of the store.

Water Control Committee Will be Formed Soon

VENTURA, Feb. 1.—With the proper conservation of water in Ventura county as its goal, the Farm Bureau has invited interested organizations to gather at Saticoy the 7th inst. for the purpose of forming a joint control committee and adopting a county-wide program upon the water problem.

Water conservation was selected as a major project of the Farm Bureau at its annual meeting at the beginning of this year. Several other groups in the county, among them the committee for the investigation of the water supply of Ventura county and the County Chamber of Commerce committee, have been working on the matter for some time.

"If constructive work is put over it must be done with the support of the entire county," C. A. Pope, president of the Farm Bureau, said today in explaining the reason for calling upon these groups to assemble and unite.

The task of saving water efficiently will be approached from the angle of better underground reservoirs, Pope stated.

Work on Tunnel Moves Rapidly

SEPULVEDA, Feb. 1.—The Sepulveda Boulevard tunnel project is rapidly nearing completion, according to a statement today by Harmon Rowland, secretary of the Sepulveda Boulevard Chamber of Commerce. The recent rains did not halt the work, which has been in progress for several months. The cement base of the archway has been completed through the entire tunnel, and workmen now are engaged in removing the core.

When completed, the tunnel will be part of a new highway, at a lower grade, between San Fernando Valley and the beach cities' district. The tunnel alone will be 635 feet in length, forty-two feet wide and twenty-six and a half feet high. A four-foot wall will be erected in the tunnel to keep separate the north and south traffic.

VENTURA, Feb. 1.—Sheriff's officers confiscated about 350 gallons of wine today from the house of E. B. Dement of this city. Officers state they found the intoxicants in a refrigerator at the Dement home.

Cost of Sewer for College to be Cut in Half

SAN DIEGO, Feb. 1.—State Teachers' College can be provided with a trunkline sewer and bay disposal plant at a district assessment cost of less than $225,000, a State board of experts informed representatives of the County Board of Supervisors and the City Council today. Estimate of the State board cut the former engineering estimate more than half and gave the city and county authorities renewed hope of solving the sewer problem which has threatened to disrupt the college plans and building program.

The State special board, sent here to study the situation and advise local authorities, is composed of C. G. Gillespie, engineer of the State Health Department; George P. MacDougal, chief of the Division of Architecture, and Prof. S. D. Harding of the University of California, the latter here in behalf of B. B. Meek, State Director of Public Works. The three will remain here for further conferences with officials interested in the college plant.

Chief Says City Invites Thieves

SANTA PAULA, Feb. 1.—That merchants in the business district here are literally inviting thieves and firebugs to enter their places of business and work under cover will be the statement contained in the police report to the City Council on Monday night by Chief of Police Thornton Edwards, he announced today.

This city has had four major fires from unknown sources since the first of the year. A survey conducted by the Chief shows that night patrolmen have found doors and windows open in the front and rear entrances of business houses and that more than 100 merchants fail to keep burglar lights burning so that patrolmen can see the interior of their stores.

MILK BOTTLES FOIL BANDIT

Sweet Shop Proprietor Lays Down Barrage of Unique Missiles, Despite Hail of Bullets from Youths

PASADENA, Feb. 1.—Armed with the license number of the bandits' automobile, police expect few hours will elapse before they capture two youths who failed in an attempt to hold up the Sunshine Sweet Shop, 2051 North Fair Oaks avenue, last night when the irate proprietor bombarded them with empty milk bottles. Charles Strutt, proprietor of the store, asserted that he became so angry when one of the bandits prodded him with a revolver butt that he seized a milk bottle in each hand and hurled the missiles so close to his assailants' heads that they yelled with terror and fled from the store.

Strutt, father of Charles Strutt, Jr., secretary of the Pasadena Lions Club, armed himself with additional bottles and gave chase, but as he was preparing to lay down a bottle barrage upon the bandits' car the youths regained sufficient courage to fire a volley of revolver shots which narrowly missed their intended victim.

Despite the bullets whizzing about his head, Strutt calmly deciphered the numbers on the license plates of the car which raced south on Morton avenue.

"No, they didn't get anything, but they would have gotten plenty if I hadn't missed fire with the milk bottles!" exclaimed the sweet shop proprietor today.

Citizens of Ojai and Santa Ana Valleys Resolve to Go it Alone in Forming Water District

VENTURA, Feb. 1.—Citizens of the Ojai and Santa Ana valleys are planning to go it alone on the problem of water development. Gird Percy, chairman of the general water committee of these districts, announced today that he is calling a meeting for next week to consider the formation of a district taking in all of the Ventura River watershed down to the municipal limits of this city. The plan is to form a district with identical limits, except for the exclusion of Ventura and territory east of the city, as was the one which was defeated on January 14 by the votes of Ventura citizens. The district will be formed under the same law as was invoked in the previous election.

"We are taking the Ventura City Council at its word," said Percy today. "It urged Ventura people to stay out of the proposed district and announced that this city has all the water it needs for the next fifty or 100 years. If that is true, the city, of course, can have no objection to our attempting to form our own district and work out our own salvation. In fact, Councilmen during the campaign said this was what should be done."

Three members are to be added for the Ventura-avenue section, said Percy, and plans for organization pushed rapidly along.

At the January 14 election the district plan carried in the unincorporated territory by a vote of two to one and in Ojai city by four to it. It was only in Ventura, where the City Council and City Attorney recommended against it at the eleventh hour, that it lost.

Baby Lima Growers Get More Checks

RESEDA, Feb. 1.—Checks amounting to $42,850 were mailed out today to members of the San Fernando Valley Bean Growers' Association, according to John H. Walters, manager of the organization. The amount gives the producers $7 per sack net to date for their last year's crop. Walters states that another $1 per sack will be mailed out again some time during February. He reports bean shipments are moving out gradually from the association warehouses and that soon there will come a demand for seed beans which will continue the market active until late in the spring. Walters reports that from present indications another large acreage will be planted to baby lima beans in the valley this season, especially in the western part of the valley area. Estimates now are that between 10,000 and 12,000 acres will be planted.

Well Drillers Find Giant Tooth

WINEVILLE, Feb. 1.—Excavators in this section showed more enthusiasm in their work today, following report from San Bernardino that a large tooth recently dug up near here was probably that of a prehistoric animal of elephant size that in early years roamed what is now San Bernardino county. The giant tooth is in possession of J. P. Coy, County Agricultural Commissioner. It was given to him by V. N. Norman, agricultural inspector here.

The tooth was found 103 feet below the surface by well drillers and was scooped up in a sand bucket. It is said to weigh three pounds. Length of the molar is five inches. It is five and a half inches across the bottom and more than three inches thick.

The original enamel is still on the face of the tooth, but petrification has set in on the upper portion.

BELLFLOWER, Feb. 1.—Edna Hatcher, 14 years of age, took her own life late yesterday at her home here after her stepmother had refused to permit her to attend a party, according to the Norwalk substation of the Sheriff's office. The girl, on being refused the desired permission, is said by her stepmother, Mrs. J. L. Hatcher, to have locked herself in her room where she fired a shot into her chest with a pistol. She died at Artesia a short time later while undergoing an operation. She admitted to Deputy Sheriffs Bert Lucas and O. L. Stockton that the wound was self-inflicted, the officers assert. Honored Elk of Redlands Dies at Home There REDLANDS, Feb. 1.—Hal Smith, honorary life member of the local lodge of Elks and well known throughout California, is dead at his home near the country club. Funeral arrangements will be made later.

Smith was 67 years of age, a native of Carleton, Mo. He came here in 1892 to take charge of the ranch of his father, the late Z. O. Smith, in East Highlands. This was about 100 acres in extent. After the disposal of this property, Smith came here to make his home, for a time living at the Elks' Club. Upon his marriage about ten years ago to Miss Daisy Virgin they established a home on Bow Road, where they since resided.

Surviving are Mrs. Smith and a cousin, Dr. Dudley Smith of Oakland, who is now on his way here. A sister-in-law is Mrs. Carl Smith, well known here, now a resident of Los Angeles. There are other relatives in the East.

Smith took an intense interest in theatricals, participating in almost every amateur event occurring during his residence here. He was responsible for the success of the twenty-five or more plays produced by the local Elks, not only playing principal parts, but also attending to business details and other matters which gave the Elks' shows high merit. No matter when called upon he gave of his time and talent without stint. The fact that he was cast in any entertainment was proof positive that it would be an artistic success.

In the earlier days he was helped materially in theatrical work by his brother Carl, and his sister-in-law, both of whom had had considerable experience in the theatrical profession, appearing in the Elks' shows of their time, Hal carrying on alone after the death of his brother.

Suspect Taken on Trip to Jail

VENTURA, Feb. 1.—"What are you doing here?"

"Oh, just looking around."

"Well, you're going to Ventura with me."

That, in substance, was the conversation which took place at 1 a.m. today between L. I. Smith and John Gallander when Smith and his wife, returning from Los Angeles, found Gallander asseretedly prowling around their home at the top of the Conejo grade.

Smith packed the suspected burglar into his machine and brought him here, where he turned him over to police. The man was transferred by them to the Sheriff and lodged in the County Jail. A complaint charging burglary was filed this morning against Gallander in the Justice Court, after it was learned from Smith that several personal articles were missing from his home.

MEXICO FIXES LEVEE PROGRAM

Colorado Flood Protection Responsibility Placed

Federal Government Issues Order Directing Plans

Translated Copy Given Out by Imperial District

EL CENTRO, Feb. 1.—For the evident purpose of ending a deadlock which has threatened to involve Imperial Valley without adequate protection during the annual Colorado River flood season this year, the Mexican Federal government has issued an order definitely fixing the responsibility for the maintenance of each separate unit in the Imperial levee system in Lower California.

The Mexican order is in the form of a letter forwarded through the Department of Agriculture and Development at Mexico City. A translated copy of the letter was made public by directors of the Imperial Irrigation District today. Under terms, the protection work along the international line will be realigned to the various interest groups as follows:

First—Imperial Irrigation District, through its Mexican subsidiary company, which owns a portion of the cultivated land in Mexican Imperial Valley, is directed to maintain the newly constructed dikes on the east side of the Colorado River.

Third—The Mexicali and Sonora Railroad is held responsible for maintenance of Rodriguez Levee.

GROUPS TOLD TO CONFER

Representatives of these three groups are directed to get together in a conference and work out a program of operations in accordance with the above assignments. Directors of the Imperial Irrigation District have announced that they will hold a special meeting tomorrow afternoon, when the new order probably will be discussed.

Representatives of the Mexicali ranching interests are reported to have made several requests for a joint meeting with the irrigation district. Engineers for the district, however, have taken the stand that no serious flood problem exists in the Lower Colorado River valley and have declined to unite in a joint program. Inasmuch as the Imperial Valley's protective works are located in Mexico, it is believed that the action of the Mexican government will force an early settlement of existing controversies between the various interests.

C. W. Brockman, Calexico member of the board, said today that he is convinced the Mexican government means to enforce its mandate.

DICTATORIAL STAND SEEN

"For several years," he said, "Mr. Rose and other members of the board have assumed a dictatorial attitude in treating with the Federal authorities at Mexicali, evidently have gotten tired of being told what to do and have decided to take the matter in their own hands. This action on the part of the Mexican government should not have been necessary if the water directors had been willing to settle the problem south of the line in a business-like manner."

Under the terms of the order the irrigation district will be responsible for the first line of levee defense, the railroad company, which is now constructing a line from the headwaters of the Gulf, must maintain the secondary line of defense, which is known as the Rodriguez Levee, and the Volcano Lake levee, which constitutes a third line of defense, will be under the control of the district.

The dikes which the Colorado River Land Company must maintain are on the east bank of the river and were constructed in order to protect lands which they were developing in that area.

All stock remaining in the building is being shipped to Los Angeles, where it will be placed in the new store of Goodan-Jenkins Company.

Sears-Roebuck's contract calls for possession of the building on March 1, and in the meantime extensive alterations will be rushed.

BUILDING OF SUNDAY SCHOOL WILL BEGIN

POMONA, Feb. 1.—A permit was issued today in the amount of $[illegible],000 for the immediate construction of the new Sunday-school building for the First Presbyterian Church. An outlay of more than $35,000,000 in land, factory buildings and equipment is in sight for the Los Angeles district in 1930.

This prediction was made last week by Robert D. Sangster, manager of the industrial department of the Chamber of Commerce, after a careful check of announced plans into the local field and proposed expansions of plants already in production.

In arriving at this figure Mr. Sangster did not take into consideration possible expansions of United States Steel and Bethlehem Steel corporations, both of whom have plants in the closing months of 1929 and who have yet to announce their programs.

PAST YEAR RECORD

During the calendar year 1929 new industries with equipment representing invested capital of $10,000,000 and expansions of established plants $16,000,000, making a total investment of $26,000,000.

Among the larger enterprises scheduled in the coming twelve months are the Procter & Gamble and Pittsburgh Plate Glass plants at Long Beach and Santa Ana, respectively. Each of the concerns is reported to spend $5,000,000. The Ford Company, manufacturer of motor cars and trucks, has started work on the first unit of what is expected to eventually be one of the foremost industries of the city.

Both Detroit Aircraft and Consolidated Aircraft each bought last year tracts ranging from twenty to fifty-five acres in extent. The former location is on Valley Boulevard, adjoining the terminal of Maxwell Air. The Detroit and Consolidated sites adjoin the Long Beach Municipal Airport.

It is confidently expected that plants for all three organizations will be built this year.

ZEPPELIN PLANT

The Goodyear Zeppelin Company has reported negotiating for a tract of land in the metropolitan area, on which it can assemble and service their new eighty-passenger capacity ships.

These major activities, together with many smaller plants already announced or to be announced in coming months, are the basis for a prediction of a $35,000,000 industrial development year.

The one exception to this condition is in the case of certain automobile manufacturers who have held up, temporarily, plans for local assembly plants. A stronger market for cars will, it is believed, bring these plants to fruition.

INFLUENCING FACTORS

"The same factors," Mr. Sangster declared, "which caused the Goodrich, Firestone, Willys-Overland and United Storage Battery companies to choose this district for branch plants during the past two and one-half years, are increasing in value.

FACT AND COMMENT

"I FEEL that by midyear we will find ourselves definitely on the upgrade. When the new era does arrive it will bring a substantial prosperity to all interests directly or indirectly affected by construction."

This conservative, yet optimistic statement came from S. J. T. Straus, vice-chairman of the board of S. W. Straus & Co., upon his arrival in Los Angeles last week.

Mr. Straus is not given to making unfounded predictions. His company maintains agencies in every State, which collect data monthly on building permits, material costs, wages and other factors that directly relate to construction.

A period of easy money is here, Mr. Straus declares, and building always prospers in such a money market. Projects that have been deferred, waiting for cheap money, will now go ahead.

The nation, States, municipalities, utilities, industry and big business in general are concentrated on a full-steam ahead schedule. President Hoover initiated the movement and the

Limit-Height Structure Will Follow Modern Type of Architecture

Construction work will begin April 1 on the limit-height building for the Sun Realty Company to rise at 629 South Hill street, according to an announcement last week of Claud Beelman, architect, who prepared the design. Plans will be issued for bids by March 15. The steel contract has been awarded the Consolidated Steel Company.

The structure will follow the modern trend of architecture with exterior of colored terra cotta. It wil have a frontage of 60 feet and extend to a depth of 150 feet. The estimated cost is $750,000. Store rooms will be provided on the first floor, five floors being lofts and six devoted to offices.

To offer advantages of corner offices in a structure on an inside lot, the architect has designed a set-back effect above the first floor which will permit of corner offices at both sides of the front.

The structure will be modern in appointments containing three high speed elevators. The lobby will be of marble with plaster ceiling.

Architect Beelman also has started construction of the Eastern Outfitting Building at Ninth and Broadway and recently completed the Ninth and Broadway Building and the Garfield Building, Eighth and Hill streets.

Recent Sales of Residences Made Public

A number of recent sales in residence and income properties were reported last week by B. G. Woodard, realty broker of 5712 South Vermont avenue.

Bank to Occupy New Quarters Early in April

HUNTINGTON PARK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The building being erected for the Huntington Park branch, Bank of Italy, is expected to be completed in March or April, when it will be one of the most attractive bank buildings in the city.

Located at the southwest corner of Pacific Boulevard and Zoe avenue, the structure, one story in height, will have a frontage of 57 feet along the boulevard, while it will extend to a depth of 108 feet, although the site has a 150-foot depth. The building under construction is Class A reinforced concrete material.

When the building is completed and the fixtures installed the property will cost approximately $200,000, it is stated.

GROUP FIGHTS DEAD BEATS

New Building Managers' Organization Plans Battle Against Non-Rent-Paying Tenants

Suggestions which may lead to the amendment of present State laws relating to the relationship of landlord and tenant featured the meeting of the newly organized Associated Managers of Buildings, Los Angeles, held in the Alexandria Hotel Tuesday.

Deadbeat tenants, it was inferred from the remarks made by all of the speakers, are in for a difficult time in this city in future if the association, through a legislative committee yet to be appointed, is able to reach the ear of the proper State authorities. More than forty members of the association present heard Julius V. Patrosso, Los Angeles attorney, declare positively that, although the present laws on the subject of landlord and tenant are generally equitable, their administration undoubtedly favored the tenant above the landlord.

Defects existing in the present remedial measures available to a landlord, upon the breach of his tenancy by the tenant, are resulting in losses of hundreds of thousands of dollars yearly in this city alone, it was stated. It was agreed at the meeting that an active effort should be made toward remedying these defects, and P. R. Kent, real-estate representative of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, was appointed chairman of a committee to study the question with a view to recommending legislation.

C. J. Pearce, manager of the Arcade Building, as joint chairman with John M. Walshe of the meeting, made a suggestion, which was adopted, that an immediate curb be placed upon those who find it cheaper to move than pay rent through establishment of a credit bureau within the building managers' organization.

An interesting sidelight on the national importance of the building manager was given in a brief address by Lemuel Freer, manager of buildings for the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company. In amount of capital invested, he said, the manager represents the biggest industry in the country, an industry that has at stake between $6,000,000,000 and $7,000,000,000, conservatively estimated, against $3,700,000,000 in the steel industry; $4,200,000,000 in the automobile industry, and $1,700,000,000 in the telephone network.

Large Ranch in Exeter Section Reported Sold

EXETER, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The Merryman ranch in the Exeter district, one of the best-known citrus properties in the central part of California, has been sold to Chaffee Earl of Los Angeles, a son of the late Edwin T. Earl, founder of the Earl Fruit Company, and a former owner and publisher of a Los Angeles newspaper. It was sold by Frank Pickard.

Four miles east of Exeter, the Merryman ranch consists of 480 acres, of which forty acres are in navels and seventeen and one-half acres in Valencias, full bearing; 100 acres in young navel trees and 146 acres in grapes. An additional fifty-seven acres of vacant land is to be planted to navels immediately. Oranges, it is understood, will eventually replace the grapes.

There are twenty houses on the ranch occupied by ranch employees. The average yearly shipment of grapes is about 450 tons.

Permits Show Decided Spurt

Building permits for the month of January disclose more than $1,500,000 gain in construction for Los Angeles thus far during the present year than during the month of January, 1929. Permits for large downtown construction projects are declared the cause of the increase. Comparative figures follow:

January, 1929 ..... $7,514,863
January, 1930 9,115,846

HOLLYWOOD HOTEL UNIT ANNOUNCED

Limit-Height Structure to Follow Purchase of Corner Property

Headed by Edward Sedgwick, Sr. of Hollywood, a syndicate of motion - picture representatives last week purchased the northeast corner of Vine and Yucca streets and will will erect on the property a height - limit apartment - hotel.

EDWARD SEDGWICK SR.

The property was purchased from William A. Freeman, attorney, for $270,000, and represents a value of $2800 per front foot on Vine street. The frontage is 98½ feet on Vine and 174 feet on Yucca.

Mr. Sedgwick, who is acting as trustee for the syndicate, declared yesterday that construction of the building waits only the closing of final details of a ninety-nine-year lease with an eastern company, which will operate the hotel.

Preliminary plans for the building call for a twelve-story unit with two wings. The ground floor will be used for stores and the upper stories for hotel rooms and apartments. A bungalow will be built on the roof of each wing, and the basement will be used for garage facilities.

The cost of the building has not been definitely determined, pending approval of the plans.

Mr. Sedgwick is the father of Edward Sedgwick, Jr., director for Buster Keaton.

Phoenix Bank Will Remodel Business Unit

PHOENIX, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Following purchase from James S. Douglas of the Fleming Block at First avenue and Washington, the Phoenix National Bank has started on improvements for which a $100,000 building permit has been obtained. The ground floor of the property for about thirty years has been occupied by the bank and its subsidiary, the Phoenix Savings Bank and Trust Company. It is to be remodeled into banking rooms, with new equipment and more tellers' cages, with new entrances and larger lobby.

The safety deposit vaults, bookkeepers' division, files and conference rooms are to go into a deep basement, while the trust and insurance business of the subsidiary will be moved to the second floor. The building of four stories and basement will be of granite foundation and with lower walls of Sespe sandstone.

WATER SALVAGE PLAN PROPOSED

Method Evolved to Prevent Present Wastage

Conservation of Run-off to Augment Supply

Sewage Reclamation Urged by Association

[This is the first of a series of articles intended to present a comprehensive history of the water situation in Los Angeles county, its water demands, past and present, and what methods are under way to capture the county's flood and other vagrant waters to replenish the underground supply.—Ed. note.]

BY CHARLES C. COHAN

Millions of gallons of flood water drain annually from the Los Angeles Basin to the ocean and are lost. Millions of gallons of other vagrant waters similarly are wasted. How best can this enormous volume be saved and made to supplement the water brought to this region from outside sources?

The Los Angeles County Conservation Association believes it has evolved the answer to this question. Its plan comprises two major projects:

(1.) The capture and underground storage of flood waters borne by streams and storm drains.

(2.) The reclamation of water wasted as sewage.

The association is not a construction organization. It acts as a clearinghouse for water conservation plans already started in the county and to be launched. To enable these projects to be carried into effect in the best possible way for the public welfare it has set in motion a new plan to co-ordinate the efforts of all agencies throughout the county interested in this water conservation. Preliminary water-salvage details have been discussed at a meeting attended by municipal and other delegations from every section of the Los Angeles basin and the lower Santa Ana River basin, in Orange county, which topographically is part of the Los Angeles area.

WATER SUPPLY DATA

In gathering all available data on the subject and impartially determining the real conditions that exist, the association does not propose to waste time by beginning a new, county-wide survey, for much of this already has been done. It aims to compile the existing surveys and fill in the gaps so that the basis for a complete, harmonious plan may be provided.

The association, however, has made a preliminary study which discloses the following significant approximations:

Annual water usage in the Los Angeles basin and lower Santa Ana River section, 708,600 acre feet, or about 230,895,000,000 gallons.

Total available supply for the basin, from precipitation and outside sources, 570,000 acre feet annually.

Annual overdraft on the ground waters of the Los Angeles basin, 138,000 acre feet.

Sewage waste in this area, 127,000,000 gallons daily or 142,000 acre feet annually.

The basin derives its water supply from two sources—the amount obtained from precipitation, such as rain and snow, and becomes available for use through stream flow or percolation to the underground gravels, and that which is brought in from an outside locality. The natural supply totals 1,063,770 acre feet, according to a recent check of the run-off. It is assumed that

Association Advises Property Owners in Battle Against Bond Evils

INTENSIVE STUDY URGED IN ASSESSMENT METHOD

Article Describes Procedure Used in Collecting for Street Widening Projects

This is the second of three articles on street improvement bond-lien evils. The third one will be published next Sunday.

BY CHARLES C. COHAN

In waging war on the street-improvement bond-lien sharks who exact piratical tribute from property owners via delinquent special-assessment bonds, the California Taxpayers' Association directs attention to the property owner's responsibility in thwarting bond-lien piracy.

It holds that while the city's method for notifying property owners of such assessments has been bunglesome, though there is an effort to tinker it into better shape which will be dealt with in another article, and that there are too many loopholes in the bond-lien foreclosure procedure, it behooves the property owner to become posted on all phases of the street-improvement bond subject. It is not difficult to understand, as will be seen from an outline of it hereinafter, and a knowledge of it is a good way to help win the war.

The city officials concerned have been doing the best they can with the notification method they are working with and they certainly want the bond-lien extortion evil put out of business.

CITY'S POSITION

A point seemingly not clearly understood, if realized at all, by many property owners here is the fact that while the street-improvement work is done under city auspices the city does not pay for the improvements and then look to the property owners for reimbursement. The city stands only in the relationship of trustee, or in effect an escrow agent, between the contractor who does the work and the property owners who are assessed for the improvement. If the contractor cannot collect from the property owners all that is due him for the job, then the city gives him negotiable bonds in the amount owing to him and which are liens against the property concerned. These bonds and the interest on them are obligations to be paid off by the interested property owners according to duly prescribed procedure. Bond payments are made through the city treasurer and cash payments are made through the City Bureau of Assessments.

It is after the bonds are sold by the contractor, or in some cases by the city, that the bond-lien sharks get in their work.

BOND PROCEDURE

The street-improvement bond procedure may be outlined as follows:

The names and addresses of property owners are filed in the City Clerk's office which is the clearing-house for all such names and addresses in city special-improvement transactions. The City Clerk sends out notices regarding contemplated special improvements so that property owners concerned may appear at specified times, if they desire, to object to the proposed work. After such work is completed, the contractor, or his assignee, proceeds according to due authorization from the Bureau of Assessments to collect from the interested property owners. Assessments under $25 are considered cash assessments and if not paid in thirty days, the contractor, or his assignee, may foreclose on the property involved.

If after the end of thirty days from the time the contractor has been authorized to begin his collections, some of the assessments in excess of $25 have not been collected, a list of such unpaid accounts is given to the Bureau of Assessments by the contractor and the bureau prepares a corresponding list of bonds to be issued as interest-bearing liens against the properties concerned, and gives such list to the city treasurer.

The City Treasurer issues these bonds as payment to the contractor. The bonds run for ten or more years, according to the stipulation involved, and bear 7 per cent interest. (It may be noted here that the contractor can keep these bonds and every six months collect on the bond coupons. If the contractor has been financed for the improvement job, as often is the case, he probably turns over to his backer enough bonds to pay him off. Conceivably the backer gets a considerable cut out of the contractor's profit from the job and so can afford to dispose of the bonds he receives at a nominal profit or even less than par. Incidentally, these bonds are good and command a ready market.)

The City Treasurer sends out notices similar to tax notices to the property owners regarding the time when the interest and principal payments on street-improvement bonds are due.

Any time after a property owner defaults in such payment the holder of the bond may ask the City Treasurer to foreclose on and sell the property involved to satisfy the bond-lien against it, or the holder of the bond may himself institute foreclosure proceedings in court.

When the City Treasurer takes the action, as the law requires him to do on such request, he advertises the impending foreclosure sale for fifteen days and if the property is not redeemed in that period he gives a certificate of sale to the purchaser. The original owner still has one year in which to redeem the property. If it is not redeemed in that period the holder of the certificate of sale can proceed to get a Treasurer's deed to the property.

If the bond holder decides to go into court himself to foreclose on the bond-lien then the customary routine of serving notice is followed and if the defendant fails to appear judgment is entered against him and the court orders the sale of the property by a court commissioner, there being the proviso that the defendant has one year in which to redeem the property before the deed to it can issue. Redemption of property within the year carries an interest penalty.

OTHER STREET WORK

In the case of opening, widening and extension work and as regards maintenance of lighting and street surfacing, no contracts are let and the Bureau of Assessments is the collecting agency from the start with the money, of course, being deposited with the City Treasurer. The maintenance of streets and lighting are cash accounts and must be paid to the Bureau of Assessments. They are not subject to the bond method of payment.

Street-opening, widening and lengthening accounts become delinquent after thirty days with a 6 per cent penalty. The property then is advertised for sale but if the owner has applied for the bond method of payment before delinquency ensues then such bond will be issued as a lien against the property. It then is up to the owner to pay off the bond and the interest on it. Such bonds are sold by the City Treasurer and command a ready sale.

Accounts pertaining to the installation of lighting systems and street resurfacing become delinquent after thirty days and there is a 5 per cent penalty on amounts of less than $25. Seven per cent bonds are issued to the contractor after the cash-payment delinquency period, as payment for accounts of $25 or more.

The sale of delinquent property by the bureau has the advantage of such property being taken over by the city, from which the former owner can buy it back.

In any instance whatever in which bond-liens occur and the bonds are sold the bond holders can proceed in the ways herein described to start foreclosure proceedings in case the bond payments due from the property owners concerned become delinquent.

The third and final article of this series will discuss remedial details instituted and proposed to cure the bond-lien shark evil.

FACT AND COMMENT

country has been quick to fall in line.

Mr. Straus's views of nation-wide conditions coincide with those expressed by California leaders that real estate, industry and the building trades can confidently expect a prosperous year.

Eliminating Noise

Schopenhauer, among his noted essays, includes one on the irritation of noise. American scientists, in recent experiments, have found that noise, in direct ratio to the amount it interferes with the worker, impedes efficiency. Just recently a leading physician ascribed noise as one of the causes for so many cases of heart failure.

So seriously is noise coming to be considered that the health commissioner of New York City has appointed specialists to delve into the problem and its remedies. Among other duties this commission will study the capacity of sound absorption, what is possible in the way of ordinances looking toward alleviation of the nuisance, and prepare a complete classification and measuring gauge for principal city noises.

Los Angeles, owing to the absence of elevated trains, and lesser traffic congestion, even on the principal business thoroughfares, suffers less from noise than the large eastern cities. But the clamor is increasing every year and many workers go home at the end of the day fagged out, not so much by the actual tasks they have been doing, as by the accompanying din and clatter.

The study of the problem in New York will be watched with interest and if any worth while remedial measures are developed, they could, perhaps, be applied in Los Angeles before the situation here has become acute.

Conveying Titles

Many persons, including those engaged in the real-estate business, fail to recognize the importance of delivery of deed in the conveyance of title to real property.

A Los Angeles case, which recently came to light, centered around finding among the effects of a man recently deceased a deed to property. The deed had been duly signed and acknowledged by this man, vesting title in the property to his son.

The son naturally thought the property his and unquestionably the father's intention was to leave it to the son. But no delivery of the deed was ever made by the grantor, as he is legally known, and thus the final and all-important act in the transfer of title had been neglected.

A technicality this may be termed, but its necessity is supported by the laws of the State. Too little attention to technicalities has snarled up more than one property deal, with subsequent annoyance, delay and actual monetary loss to the parties involved.

WATER SALVAGE PLANNED

of this volume, 600,000 acre feet are lost through flood wastage, evaporation and water needed for plant growth. It is estimated that 170,000 acre feet of water are brought to the basin by Los Angeles from Owens Valley.

In turning its attention to the enormous importance of replenishing our subsoil water supply with water that now is wasted, the association takes full cognizance of the fact that this method cannot eliminate the necessity for developing other outside sources of water supply for Los Angeles county. However, it admittedly will take years to bring in water from the Colorado River, for instance, even after such a project is begun. In the meantime it is imperative to utilize the underground replenishment plan and other water conservation methods to supplement the water now being brought in from Owens Valley and also to offset it possible the overdraft on the subterranean supply.

This brings consideration to the outstanding methods proposed to effect this replenishment.

SALVAGE METHODS

Fortunately for Los Angeles county, it has deep and extensive absorbent strata which is ideal for the storage of an enormous amount of water. What these natural reservoirs have meant to the life of this region and what has been happening to their contents through a long period of time will be detailed in a subsequent article.

Pertinently interesting is the fact that various water salvage ideas have been worked out to the point where they permit of their detailed explanation under the following broad descriptions:

(1.) Conservation in connection with flood control, work and the spreading of all possible water upon the gravel cones of our major streams.

(2.) Consideration of the possibility of salvaging some of the great amount of wasted flood waters which periodically are found in the lower valley and in coastal areas.

(3.) Possibility of reclaiming a large part of the sewage water waste through the activated sludge method of treatment and natural ground filterage.

The Times recently published a flood-water absorption plan proposed by E. C. Eaton, chief engineer of the Los Angeles County Flood Control District. Its salient feature is a system of interlocking canals and ditches branching from each main stream in the county, thereby enabling a retarding of the flood crest, the diffusion of the flood water over a considerable area and its accelerated percolation into the natural underground reservoirs.

The salvaging of the lower valley and costal flood waters has as a timely corelative the problem presented by the possible danger of salt water infiltration from the ocean into a part of the absorbent strata near the coastal line, and in which there also has been a consistent drop in the water plane.

SEWAGE RECLAMATION

It has been authoritatively stressed before the association that much misapprehension exists regarding the reclamation of sewage and that it has been conclusively demonstrated that the water involved in it can be rectified to an extent that makes it entirely and properly available for many important uses. This phase of water conservation is emphasized by the finding that the 235.6 second feet, or 170,000 acre feet, of water, which Los Angeles brought in last year via its Owens River Valley aqueduct, is just 27,750 acre feet more than the present Los Angeles county sewage waste. Attention has been called to the report that the joining of other sewers to the Los Angeles city trunk line is contemplated, which will mean additional water waste each year.

The association's inquiry points out that Pasadena and Pomona have sewage disposal plants where much water is reclaimed. The Pasadena plant, of the activated-sludge type, averages 9,000,000 gallons per day and the Pomona plant, 3,000,000 gallons daily. Each 1,000,000 gallons of sewage yields one ton of dried fertilizer, which is sold at $25 per ton, yielding a revenue of $225 daily, based on the treatment of 9,000,000 gallons each day. The untreated sewage contains from 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 bacteria per cubic centimeter, which is reduced in the effluent to from 100 to 300 per cubic centimeter. The State allows 1000. Twenty pounds of chlorine per 1,000,000 gallons is used. The water after treatment goes in an outfall line and empties into the Rio Hondo.

INDUSTRY WILL ENJOY GROWTH

As applied to the automotive industry, these factors are a large and highly concentrated local market with increased per capita purchases of motor cars; large supplies of efficient and contented labor, adapted to the automotive industry and allied lines; facility of distribution to other markets throughout the western States by rail and coastwise transportation and the value of quicker deliveries and better service to dealers and the trade from Los Angeles than from eastern points.

"The advantages of low inventories and quick delivery from spot stocks are not only of economic value to the manufacturer and distributor, but reflect greater satisfaction to the car purchaser.

"During 1929, Southern California counties substantially increased their proportionate purchase of automobiles as compared with other sections of the Pacific Coast markets, compared to the record of 1928 and recent years.

"For some years these southern counties have absorbed approximately 43 per cent of all new passenger automobiles sold in the three Coast States of California, Washington and Oregon, while last year the percentage was increased to 48.

"Los Angeles city and county new-car sales are much greater per unit of population than for any other equal number of inhabitants in the world.

"The Willard battery plant, recently completed, with a capacity for manufacturing 2000 automotive batteries per day, is the latest evidence that nationally known manufacturers catering to the motoring public are recognizing the value of manufacturing and distribution advantages offered by the Los Angeles district."

A building at 2215 South Hoover street has been leased to the Sweets of the Bloom Company, manufacturers of a soda confection. The Schlorman Furniture Company have taken quarters at 2217 South Hoover street and the Old Chef Products Company, manufacturers of relishes, have rented space at 2216 South Hoover street.

Tourist Season Peak Expected Late in Month

Los Angeles' winter tourist season is in full away, although the peak period is not expected until the last week in February, according to a report yesterday by the downtown rental bureau of Consolidated Hotels, Inc.

This month has been the best since the bureau's establishment, with at least 75 per cent of apartments and rooms rented to residents of other States. Inquiries from the East and Middle West have been especially heavy this month also, thus discounting the former belief that the crash of the stock market would affect tourist business here, the report declares.

Survey Discloses Trend of New Downtown Construction Work

CITY'S GROWTH OF PAST SEVEN YEARS OUTLINED

Seventh Street Leads in Valuation of Projects With Hill and Wilshire Following

Great building strides made in developing Los Angeles' most important business streets during the past seven years are indicated in a survey of building permits, costing $100,000 or more, that has been issued by the city building department.

The survey, carefully checked from building department records by the statistical department of the Better Street Improvement Association, shows that more large buildings have been constructed on Seventh street than any other street in Los Angeles. The total for this street for the seven-year period is [illegible].

HILL STREET SECOND

Second in the list of streets is Hill street, with buildings totaling a value of $15,225,450. Sixth street, with a total of $15,191,867, is third, and Flower street, with $14,637,000 is fourth.

Wilshire Boulevard is next with [illegible],700, while Broadway and Spring street follow with $11,588,600 and $10,894,500 respectively. Hollywood Boulevard, with $9,580,700, is eighth position, while Eighth street is ninth with $8,492,300.

The survey indicates, the association pointed out, the trend of development of Los Angeles. Building development closely follows retail trade, even though a large portion of the larger buildings are used for office and loft purposes.

The records are intended to include commercial developments, and for this reason, such buildings as are used for public purposes, such as City Hall, jails, libraries, and noncommercial buildings, such as electric sub-stations and churches, are not included.

Generally speaking, the trend is westward on Sixth, Seventh and Eighth streets, from Broadway to Figueroa, filling in the undeveloped properties on the intersecting north and south streets. Such streets as Broadway and Spring streets were already well developed, so the overflow expansion sought out new territory.

UNIFORM EXPANSION

Most of the streets have had a fairly uniform expansion, with each year disclosing a large building total. The development of Wilshire Boulevard, for instance, shows regular gains, with the exception of 1934.

Seventh street had its big year in 1925, while Sixth street had its best development in 1924 and 1928. Hollywood Boulevard and Flower street have had even, regular expansions, while Spring street's biggest year was in 1927.

The development of Franklin avenue, starting with 1926, shows that in the past four years, the value of high-class apartments has totaled $2,271,000. Normandie avenue has had exceptional building development, with a total of $4,333,000 for the past seven years. Kenmore avenue has shown great building growth, with $1,504,000 worth of apartment-houses in seven years.

In making the above survey, the association credited buildings erected at the intersection of major streets, to each street involved. Thus, a building constructed at Ninth and Broadway increases the total of both Ninth street and Broadway.

For 1929, Flower street is the leader, with Wilshire Boulevard second, and Olive street third. The construction of two or three buildings, each costing in excess of $1,000,000, offers a great impetus to the development of the streets involved.

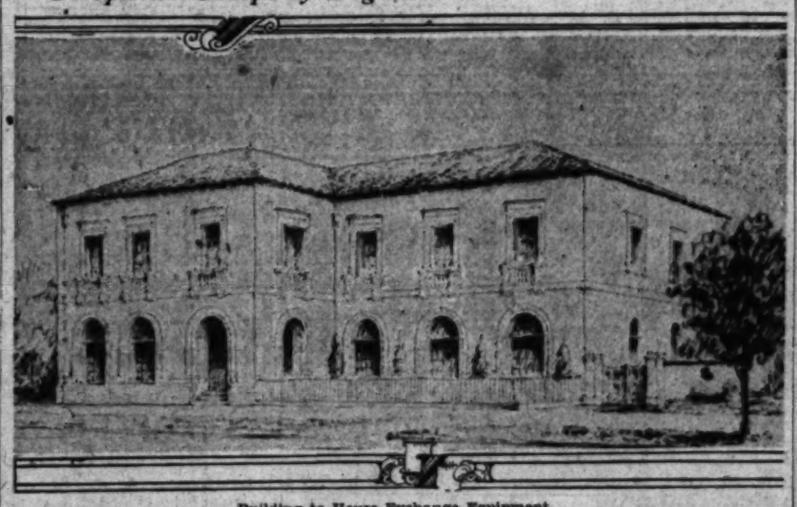
The survey indicates the steady growth of Los Angeles, not only in the downtown section, but along the city's best outlying commercial streets, such as Wilshire Boulevard and Hollywood Boulevard.

There are a number of other streets, such as La Brea avenue, where there have been intense commercial development, but where but few buildings, costing $100,000 or more each, are constructed.

The first twenty-five streets, in building construction in seven years, are as follows:

Seventh street	316,405,945
Hill street	15,225,450
Sixth street	15,191,867
Flower street	14,637,000
Wilshire Boulevard	11,687,700
Broadway	11,588,600
Spring street	10,894,500
Hollywood Boulevard	9,580,700
Eighth street	8,492,300
Figueroa street	8,197,900
Ninth street	8,078,750
Grand avenue	7,973,945
Olive street	5,317,000
Hope street	5,165,000
Los Angeles street	4,720,950
Main street	4,677,000
Normandie avenue	4,333,000
Fifth street	4,308,700
Tenth street	2,840,000
Franklin avenue	2,271,000
Washington street	2,167,350
Vine street	2,147,000
Western avenue	2,111,000
Vermont avenue	1,865,000
San Pedro street	1,837,445

Telephone Company Begins Work on Anaheim Unit



Building to House Exchange Equipment

Construction was started last week on the $98,700 building which is to house the Anaheim exchange equipment of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company. This structure is to be the center of an equipment investment which during the present year will see $387,000 expended in Anaheim, according to Earl Morrow, district manager for the telephone company. William Rohrbacher, general contractor of Santa Ana, is erecting the building.

Firm Appoints F. W. Rohrer as New Manager

Fred W. Rohrer has been promoted to the position of manager of the securities department of Dickinson and Gillespie Corporation. Mr. Rohrer became identified with Dickinson and Gillespie six years ago as a member of the sales department, and later became branch manager of the Pasadena-Glendale territory. In 1926 he was made general manager of the Griffith Park Manor properties in Glendale. He assisted in the acquisition of property for the new Grand Central Air Terminal adjoining Griffith Park Manor. His activities on this tract led to his appointment as manager of the securities department.

FRED W. ROHRER.

New Tract to be Formally Opened Today

Viewpark Heights, new view development of the Los Angeles Investment Company, will be officially opened today, according to W. H. Harrison, vice-president and general manager.

The tract includes the final forty acres of the company's hillside development, Viewpark, located at the intersection of West Vernon avenue and Angeles Mesa Drive, and extending west covering the eastern slopes of the Baldwin Hills.

One of the features of the new unit is the variety of sites. All shapes and sizes are included in this final acreage, and each lot adapted for a variety of architectural design. For the main part the new tract will consist of frontages from sixty to ninety feet, with depths sufficient for gardens or playgrounds.

Daniels Will Lead Activity of Local Firm

Announcement was made last week by Clifford F. Reid, of the appointment of T. Herbert Daniels as director of public relations of Clifford F. Reid Company, Inc., developers of Hollywood Riviera, Santa Monica Bay project.

CLIFFORD F. REID

In commenting upon the current home-building activity at Hollywood Riviera, of which the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph McDowell Mathews is the latest to be completed, a visiting eastern writer remarked on the silence, hospitality and environment of mountains and ocean, according to A. H. Bredenbeck, treasurer of the company.

Roadside Inn to Occupy Site on Thoroughfare

Five-year leases have been signed between Julius Godschy and Bob Murphy, whereby the latter takes over the southeast corner of Robertson Boulevard and Nineteenth street together with improvements thereon to be used for a roadside inn.

Murphy is a former vaudevillian and was the proprietor of a New York night club. He began his life career as a chef in a Santa Fe dining car, and plans personally to supervise the cuisine of his new establishment. Actual opening day is to be announced later, following completion of extensive improvements and alterations which Murphy is making on the building already erected on the premises.

Recent Deals in Homes Told by Operator

Ruth Mix, vaudeville headliner and daughter of Tom Mix, last week purchased the home at 233 South Crescent Drive, Beverly Hills. The purchase price was $19,500 and the deal was handled by H. A. Reed of the Arthur M. Kelley Company, Beverly Hills real estate agents.

Mr. Reed also reports the sale of a home at 705 North Bedford Drive to Fred Ware of Chicago, for $30,000.

Through the Kelley company, Donald P. Loye, technical adviser with the Electrical Research Products Company, has purchased a residence at 616 North Alpine Drive for a price reported as $30,000.

REALTY DEALER TO HANDLE HOME AREA

VAN NUYES, Feb. 1. (Exclusive) Bliss Park, residential section of the south edge of Van Nuys, has been taken over by Fred A. Kellogg, realty dealer here. Two homes are to be erected in Bliss Park as soon as plans are completed.

Capitalists of East Favoring Property Here

Capitalists and syndicates from the East and Midwest are coming to Southern California in greater numbers than ever before to invest in business and residential properties, declares S. L. Crebes, vice-president of Burton & Co., who just returned from an extensive trip to the east, west and southeast parts of the United States.

Mr. Crebes, who made the trip in the interests of Burton projects, expressed himself as pleased with the attitude of eastern and midwest financiers toward California residential and business enterprises.

"A great number of persons in these districts lost heavily in the recent stock depressions," said Mr. Crebes. "After the crash they realized the value of investing their money in legitimate, high-class realty holdings. The feeling is prevalent back east that Southern California real estate is going ahead rapidly."

Demands for Homes Held on Upward Trend

Increase of individual homes have been more in evidence since the first of the year than at any time throughout 1929, according to L. A. Hardie, sales manager of the Huntington Palisades division of the Santa Monica Land and Water Company.

"We have had more interest in completed homes ready for occupancy, and for homesites for immediate consideration, in the past ten days than for many months," says Hardie. "We closed a deal this week for a home that was just completed the day preceding. It was purchased by Frank Shay, general manager of Pathe International. He told us that Southern California had no equal, in his estimation, when it came to living amid all that makes life worth while and he has traveled throughout the world.

Concern Opens Residence Unit Near Burbank

Announcement was made last week of the opening, scheduled for February 1, of unit No. 2 of Boeing Square, located adjacent to the Boeing Air Terminal in Burbank. The organization of B. W. Griffitts is developing the property.

Preliminary to the announcement approximately 150 members of the organization were addressed by Lieut. D. W. Tomlinson, vice-president of the Maddux Air Lines, and Col. Art Goebel, winner of the Dole flight to Hawaii. They spoke on the future of aviation.

The organization features a novel plan in the sale of property, that of giving prospective purchasers a view of the property from above, each being taken on an airplane flight.

WELCOME EXTENDED TO CULVER

Realtors Present Leader With Many Gifts as Tokens of Esteem

A "welcome home" to Harry H. Culver, past president of the Los Angeles Realty Board, who retired from the presidency of the National Association of Real Estate Boards last week, was extended by the Los Angeles board in the form of a hand-lettered and illuminated scroll.

The presentation was made by Mason Case, past president of the board, at the president's banquet following the sessions of the mid-winter meeting of the association at Phoenix.

Culver was also the recipient of a scroll from the national association, a Navajo rug from the Phoenix realtors, and a loving cup from individual members of the association.

A unique gift was a book, eighteen inches wide, three feet long and one foot thick, and weighing 120 pounds, containing news clippings from papers in cities which he visited during his term of office. The presentation was made by Herbert U. Nelson, the association's secretary.

New Official Appointed by Realty Firm

Vernon Hoxie, formerly of Adrian, Mich., has recently been made vice-president and a director of La Bonte & Ransom Co., Ltd. He is also an officer and director of the Windsor Mortgage Company, an affiliated organization.

Mr. Hoxie's experience in the real-estate, building and financing fields is declared to be an asset to La Bonte & Ransom, who, in addition to their general real-estate business, have a separate building department. Affiliated departments and organizations specialize in financing, insurance and escrows.

Mr. Hoxie recently purchased a home on Roxbury Drive, Beverly Hills.

Home Shortage Held Apparent at Wilmington

In spite of the fact that Wilmington, Los Angeles Inner Harbor, has been growing rapidly and steadily in the past two years, a careful survey shows there is an acute shortage of housing facilities, according to J. W. Weightman, secretary-manager of the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce. This is especially true in view of the fact that March 1, the Ford Motor Company's plant will commence operations with a force of 1500 to 2000 employees, which will probably be increased to 3000. Part of the Ford plant is in Wilmington.

The Western Oil and Refining Company's new $1,000,000 cracking plant and the new Copra Meal Company's plant will also add employees to Wilmington's present annual pay roll of $34,240,000.

Walnut Groves Figure in Deal

VAN NUYS, Feb. 1. (Exclusive) William G. Lauesen of Reseda and Walter Mendenhall and John W. Praiswater of Van Nuys, San Fernando Valley business men, have purchased the Alice Beckstead walnut grove of forty acres on West Vanowen street, in the western end of the valley, near Fallbrook avenue. Praiswater also bought a one-third interest in the adjoining walnut grove owned by Mendenhall, Lauesen and the Van Nuys Land Development Company. The two properties will immediately be put into first-class productive condition.

Lauesen and Mendenhall also are interested in 300 acres in the Reseda and Owensmouth areas. Mrs. Beckstead has closed out all her acreage in San Fernando Valley in order to devote herself to other large holdings in Carpinteria, which she is developing extensively.

GARAGE TO BE BUILT

Architect A. G. Bailey is preparing working drawings for a three-story Class A garage building to be erected on San Pedro street, near Jackson street, costing approximately $47,000.

PROGRESS IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA INDUSTRY

NEW INDUSTRIAL CITY PROJECTED

Pebbly Beach Combines All Catalina Shops

Factories Supply Material for Export Trade

Model Homes Provided for Island Workmen

An industrial city, distinct and removed from the pleasure resort, has been created by William Wrigley, Jr., on Catalina Island. All the industries that make the wheels of progress on the Magic Isle go round, have been assembled at Pebbly Beach, a picturesque cove two miles west of Avalon. A paved road, wide enough for two trucks to pass, and a Avalon Boardwalk connect Pebbly Beach with the island resort city. The Catalina Furniture Factory, the planing mill, paint shop and sundry other industries have been removed to Pebbly Beach from Avalon Canyon, which now is given over entirely to recreational activities.

Mr. Wrigley has developed Catalina's resources to the point of providing its own materials, and exporting crushed rock, various clay products and Catalina-made furniture to mainland markets.

Pebbly Beach has been converted into a model industrial city on a small scale, with every feature for economic operation, utility and safety as well as the housing of the employees, carefully planned.

The industries represented at Pebbly Beach involve something like $2,500,000. When in full operation there are approximately 1000 employees on the Catalina Island Company pay roll.

LARGEST IN SOUTH

The Catalina Island crushing plant is declared the largest hillside operation in Southern California. The quarry is now 18,000 feet from the crusher and the highest point in the quarry face is 826 feet above the floor, states J. Forrest, superintendent of the island plant. Rock products are conveyed in dump cars on to a loading wharf where an automatic weigher empties them into 1000-ton barges. Four grades of rock are shipped from the island, approximately 50,000 tons being shipped monthly. Within the last two years clay deposits have been opened on the island. The brick, tile and pottery plants were originally built at Pebbly Beach to supply only the local demand. The new $2,000,000 Catalina Casino was made possible because of home production of brick and tile.

The finished clay products are loaded directly from the kilns at Pebbly Beach to platforms which in turn are loaded on to barges by crane and shipped to the Long Beach Sales yards where a complete stock of Catalina Island clay products are carried and distributed to contractors. More than half the Catalina output, however, is used locally in the extensive island building program.

POTTERY INDUSTRY

Catalina pottery is one of the newer industries at Pebbly Beach. The fine clays adapt themselves to molding. Gigantic Spanish and Italian garden and flower pots glazed in various solid and blended colors attract the attention of many island visitors. Distinctive smaller vases, novelty ware and souvenirs of clay are also turned out at the island pottery works. Plaques and decorative tile, representing the famed Catalina marlin swordfish, flying fish, conventional seaweed and other Catalina motifs are among the clay products made at the plant by hand.

At the Catalina Furniture Factory practically all the furniture for the island hotels, homes and public buildings is made. Some of the outstanding pieces are the gumwood library tables in the country clubhouse, made from native-grown Catalina gumwood. The ornamental furniture in futuristic motif, which graces the lobby of the new theater auditorium, was also made at the local plant, as well as some of the antique treasure chests, old Spanish period furniture and modernistic pieces. Considerable furniture is also made for export to the mainland.

GOAT HIDES TANNED

Mr. D. M. Renton, general manager of Catalina Island, who is largely responsible for the carrying out of Mr. Wrigley's policy of utilizing the island's resources, is about to add another industry. The island is famed for its thousands of wild mountain goats that have roamed the hills since the discovery of Catalina by the Spanish explorers. During recent years they have multiplied to such an extent that they have become a considerable problem. Mr. Renton has had some 200 hides tanned and proposes to use them as coverings for Spanish leather chairs, which will be manufactured at the furniture factory. Leather jackets, gloves and other articles will probably also be made from Catalina goat skins.

The wood used at the island furniture factory is milled at the plant adjoining. A machine shop and blacksmith shop are also a part of the Pebbly Beach industries. At the blacksmith shop hand-wrought iron pieces are made for window and balcony grills in the new Spanish type buildings that are being erected. Standards of wrought iron are also made for tile top tea tables.

All industries at Pebbly Beach are housed in new buildings of typically Spanish architecture. Administration and executive offices for superintendents of each plant, stores for provisions and supplies, barber shops, cafes and sundry shops for the convenience of employees are a part of the new Pebbly Beach industrial city.

In a sheltered little canyon which opens onto the beach are the homes of the workmen and their families. These are neat cottages under spreading trees and set in pretty gardens. Every modern convenience, baths, showers and tile kitchens, have been built into each house by the South Catalina Island Company. The houses are leased to employees at a monthly rental, from $12 to $20, according to number of rooms.

CONSTRUCTION PLANS ∽ QUESTIONS ANSWERED

PLAN STRESSES SIMPLE DESIGN

Drawing Awarded Prize in Recent Contest

Ornamentations Conspicuous By Absence

Home Cost May Be Held at $4500 Total

BY THEODORE A. KOETZLI

The announcement that in the Midwest competition just held by the Monolith Portland Cement company the first prize was awarded by the jury to Walter L. Moody, Los Angeles architect, makes of special interest his work in the field of smaller houses, and one of them is shown today.

Following are Mr. Moody's own comments in regard to it:

"It seems that those things which the world and curious enjoy entirely in much attention from the observer. In fact, that which is simple and beautiful is often passed by without that which is bizarre and ornate.

"This situation may be justified by the fact that we have presented to us such a variety of styles that to the uninitiated, it is difficult to find a basis for right conclusions. We see so much that is ugly and so little that is beautiful that our esthetic taste has small opportunity for development. We become used to ugliness and perhaps it is that we find relief in anything that is different, whether it be good or bad.

"Regardless of architectural style, we may say generally that the more successful houses are those of plain mass, good proportions, pleasant color, a simple and just use of materials, and all in a proper adaptation to usefulness.

"In the early days of this nation there existed in our country a simple and dignified style of architecture which was appropriate and well adapted to the needs of the day. The colonial style, which is referred to, grew out of the good precedent set by our conventional English ancestors. In recent times we have become more commercial and perhaps somewhat less discriminating in taste. Consequently many of our houses, large and small, are full of the faults of poor planning.

"Successful building is not a thing of chance. The dictates of good business require a carefully laid plan of procedure. The lack of careful planning is, in the final analysis, the reason for much that is poor and unsatisfactory.

"The sketch published today has a suggestion of English precedent. It stands the test of simplicity in design and is appropriate for the needs of the average small family. The plan is not one picked from the latest bungalow book. The plan and elevations are a combined unit, designed to fit an average city lot.

"Inspection of the arrangement of rooms will disclose convenience and accessibility of the various elements. The living-room and dining-room are so located as to give privacy to the family, with a pleasant vista on the garden. In this way we are able to realize by careful planning the full possibilities of a small city lot.

"There are about 1100 square feet of floor area, and the building cost can probably be kept within $4500.

Question: I am especially concerned regarding the correct method of hanging the curtains and draperies in our new home, which will be equipped throughout with steel casements. Do you know of some brochure which will help me?

Answer: "Decorating With Casements" is well edited and beautifully illustrated and goes into minute detail regarding the proper ways to curtain and screen steel casement windows. It gives authentic information on materials, their cut and hang, how and when to use valences, etc. Copies are obtainable on written request only.

Q: An eastern friend tells me that electric power units for the operation of garage doors are in general use and giving satisfactory service. Can you give me further information?

A: Power-door installations are possible with virtually any type of garage door, and may be installed to operate four-fold, three-fold, double-swing (in or out), overhead and sliding, efficiently and economically. Each unit is shipped complete ready for installation. Erection prints and electrical diagrams are included. Literature is available.

Q: How does the growth of the building-loan business of California compare with the rest of the country? Can you give some figures on the investment phase of building-loan associations in this State?

A: California has doubled its building-loan resources every two and one-half years while the nation as a whole doubles its assets every four and one-half years. There are more than 440,000 investors in California building - loan associations, and their total savings amount to more than $350,000,000. Shareholders, etc., received more than $2,000,000 as interest and dividends last year.

Q: How much hot water can one expect from an up-to-date automatic heater and what points should be considered in their selection?

A: An improved type of automatic water heater is claimed to deliver two gallons per minute. Simple construction permits low selling price. Gas bills are kept to a minimum as no unused water is reheated. A good make will give splendid service continuously for an indefinite period.

(Questions of this nature will be answered and illustrated literature sent gratis if queries are addressed to Rex Avon, care Real Estate Editor, The Times.)

COLOR USE POPULAR IN BATHROOM

Attitude of Public Held Completely Reversed in Last Twenty Years

In the last twenty years the American public is said to have changed completely its attitude toward color in the home. Twenty years ago one of the largest manufacturers of plumbing equipment put some colored plumbing fixtures on the market. They wouldn't sell. The public wasn't ready for color. Today this company and other companies making colored enameled ware and vitreous china pottery report an increase of 200 per cent in the sales of colored fixtures in 1929 as compared to 1928.

The most popular colors for bathroom fixtures and kitchen sinks are green, lavender, orchid, ivory and brown. Artists explain the popularity of green by pointing to the fact that it is a cool color.

While a large bathroom may permit the use of contrasting colors, in a small bathroom, good taste would dictate that all fixtures be of the same color. Sometimes lights will create the effect of unmatched fixtures. For instance, there is usually a strong light over the lavatory and a weak light near the tub. While discrepancies in lighting may cause an apparent difference in color values, an ideal lighting system would show a perfect matching of colors, artists say.

HOME NEEDS ON PACIFIC ESTIMATED

Survey of Requirements Indicates Large Sums Will Be Expended

More than $130,000,000 will probably be required during 1930 to finance the erection of new residential housing in Pacific Coast cities, according to estimates of S. W. Straus & Co., based on today's balance between supply and demand and on the records of the past two years. Of this amount, approximately 40 per cent may be expected to go into multifamily housing, apartment-houses, flats and hotels.

In most cities of this area, occupancy records indicate that the reduced building program of the last few years, particularly that of 1929, has restored the lists of unsold residences and the tenant lists of rental properties to a basis which is practically normal, the Straus survey indicates. Current increase in population, constantly shifting centers of residential preference, and an ever-increasing desire for better housing accommodations are the three factors which are depended on to assure stability to the building industry in this class of construction.

A total of $286,700,000 was expended for this class of buildings in 100 principal Pacific Coast cities during the past two years, a figure which students of the subject have considered inadequate to meet the normal new housing requirements of a population increasing as has that of this area. Economists analyzing the building prospects for 1930 have reported that the costs for new building this year may amount to 10 per cent more than in 1929, and that a normal proportion of this increase will be required for residential housing.

Realty Boards Plan Greeting for New Leader

California real estate boards are making preparations for large regional meetings in honor of Leonard P. Reaume of Detroit, newly installed president of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, who in a visit to this State will address several of the local boards. The schedule was arranged by President W. H. Daum of the California Real Estate Association.

Tomorrow he will address a meeting of representatives of the thirteenth and fifteenth regional districts at Pasadena under auspices of the local board. State Vice-President E. V. Latham of Alhambra will preside. The following day Mr. Reaume will address the Los Angeles Realty Board at luncheon, and in the evening will speak at a regional dinner in Long Beach.

On Wednesday he will address the San Diego-Imperial district at the San Diego board luncheon, the following day he will address the Orange county realty men at luncheon at Santa Ana, leaving that evening for San Francisco, where he will address a regional meeting under auspices of the local board at luncheon on Friday. President L. A. Weidenmuller will preside.

The final engagement will be at Oakland the next day, where a regional luncheon has been planned by President Fred T. Wood.

School Bonds to be Voted on

PRESCOTT (Ariz.) Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—A bond issue for the enlargement of the public school facilities will be voted upon in February by the voters of Prescott, Ariz.

The amount of the issue and the exact election date have not yet been decided, but some additional buildings must be completed by September 1, according to Dr. Frank W. Boville, president of the Board of Education. Dr. Boville claims that conditions are so overcrowded that even the temporary wooden buildings are not able to care for the great numbers of pupils enrolled.

College Will Build Library

TEMPE (Ariz.) Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Plans are being prepared by Lescher & Mahoney of Phoenix for a $90,000 library building on the campus of the Tempe State Teachers' College. It is to be of two stories, 50 by 80, with a 30-by-80 reading room on the second floor, and with stack room for 40,000 volumes. Much of the main floor will be cut into administrative offices. Construction will be fireproof.

National Men Speakers Here on Appraisals

Methods of appraising residential and business property were discussed in the assembly hall of the Los Angeles Realty Board Wednesday.

The lecturers were Dr. Arthur J. Mertzke and Frederick H. Babcock, both specialists in appraisal work. Mertzke is director of education and research for the National Association of Real Estate Boards, and Babcock is a former instructor in appraising at the Chicago Central College of Commerce and also at Northwestern University. The conference was a part of the educational work being done by the association for the benefit of members of its constituent boards.

Property Law and Items of Home Finance

BY SAMUEL STEELMAN

Member of the teaching staff of University of California extension division. Member of the law firm of Ogden, Stedman and Crocker

Q.: How long can a note remain unpaid before outlawing in the State of California? A. P. T.

A.: The Statute of Limitations on notes is four years from the date the note becomes due. This may be extended by a written acknowledgment of the debt or by the absence of the maker from the State.

Q.: A man has title to certain property in his own name. His mother and sister have contributed equal amounts with himself in making the purchase. He now desires to convey rights to them so that all three shall be joint owners. How can this be done? H. P.

A.: Under a recent amendment to our laws, he may execute a deed in favor of himself, his mother and sister, as joint tenants. A joint tenancy deed should be used.

Q.: Father and son are buying land together. On account of sickness and lack of work, the payments will probably be in default. Will a homestead protect their rights? A. H.

A.: A homestead cannot be used to evade payment of the purchase price on the property homesteaded.

Q.: I bought acreage on which there was a ten-foot easement for road purposes. The easement has been abandoned and I wish to clear this from the record. What should be done? P. H. A.

A.: If the easement is in favor of a private person, a quit claim deed from the person in whose favor it runs should be obtained, or a quiet title action maintained against such person. If the easement is for a public road, abandonment proceedings should be had by the proper city or county authorities.

Q.: My wife and I own real estate in joint tenancy. According to California laws, I understand the surviving parent must name at least one of his children as heir in his will. (1) Is there any limitation by law as to what minimum this heir is entitled to? (2) Is it necessary to leave anything, or even mention the names of the other children? (3) If the parent does not mention the children in the will, can they contest it? P. M.

A.: Nothing need be left to any of the children, but the intent to omit the children must appear on the face of the will. Therefore, each child, or child of a deceased child, must be mentioned in the will, even though nothing is left to him. If such precaution is not taken, any child omitted will be entitled to such share of the estate he would have received had there been no will.

Q.: I am purchasing a lot on a contract and am unable to keep up the payments. The seller claims he can sue and place a lien on my homestead for the balance due. F. R.

A.: I am assuming that your homestead is not the lot you refer to above. If you have filed a valid declaration of homestead, your homestead cannot be levied on for any debt arising out of the above contract.

Q.: A tenant left my house, owing rent for four months. He has bought furniture and a car on the installment plan. What can I do? L. P.

A.: The furniture is exempt. The car can be attached, but you must be prepared to pay the balance due the seller of such car.

Q.: I purchased acreage from a land company on a contract. Since then I have found out that they probably cannot deliver good title. The contract is not fully paid. What can I do? D. A. E.

A.: The company is not bound to deliver good title until the contract is fully paid. You should tender the balance due and keep the tender good by depositing it in a bank. The tender should be conditional upon the delivery of a deed and a guarantee of title. If such delivery is not made you can then sue the company for a return of the money paid, or for damages, at your option.

(Questions of this nature will be answered if addressed to Samuel Steelman, care the Real Estate Editor of The Times.)

COUNTIES TO EXHIBIT AT LAND SHOW

Cost of Realty Board Project Estimated at $100,000 Total

Cost of the California Land Show in Los Angeles, March 8 to 23, will be $100,000, exclusive of the value of exhibits, it was estimated by the citizens' committee in charge, at a meeting yesterday.

It is estimated also by the committee that 50,000 persons will come to Los Angeles on the excursions run for special county days, of which there will be several daily during the run of the show. The committee says that a survey of the facts sustains its original estimate of a minimum attendance for the sixteen days of 500,000.

San Diego county has announced participation. The Supervisors have appropriated funds and a large central space will be taken. County Agricultural Commissioner R. R. McLean will have charge and the San Diego Chamber of Commerce will co-operate. Chambers of various communities will aid in assembling farm and orchard products and other material for the exhibit.

PLANS ORDERED

The Austin Company of California has been commissioned to prepare plans for a $50,000 automobile accessory retail store and service station at the center of Haley and Chapala streets, Santa Barbara, for the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company.

TITLE INSURANCE. III

Special Mechanic's Lien Policy.

This policy goes further than the ordinary mortgagee's or beneficiary's form of policy, though it is not "full coverage," it protects the loan by specifically insuring the lender against loss of principal, interest or other secured sums sustained by reason of any mechanic's lien filed, or of any loss sustained because of foreclosure action in connection therewith, such lien having been based on claims that building operation had been begun prior to the recordation of the mortgage or trust deed securing the loan.

When called upon to furnish this type of policy, an inspection is ordered at once. Before 8 o'clock on the morning that it is planned to record the mortgage or trust deed the title company sends an inspector and a photographer to the building site in question. If the inspection discloses that any building materials are actually on the premises or labor of any sort has been performed, a phone call to the title company stops the proposed recording of the papers. Before accepting an order for a special mechanic's lien policy, the title company reserves the right to be fully informed as to the character of the loan.

These policies are of several types. "Full coverage" means full protection, with no exceptions or qualifications on the part of the insuring company. They are issued only after an inspection and survey have been made.

Some of the eastern life insurance companies have settled upon forms which meet their particular needs. Among title companies these forms are known as the "L. I. C." (Life Insurance Company) and as the "A.T.A." (American Title Association) Standard Loan. They are issued after completion of the building.

Another type of full coverage policy is the "special loan form," which includes a photograph of the premises and a guaranteed survey showing the character and location of all improvements.

These full coverage policies insure the holder of the mortgage or trust deed against all those risks of which the public records give no warning. They involve, among other things, forgeries, acts of minors and incompetents, claims of heirs in case of invalid wills and unknown rights of wife or husband. They also insure against all the numerous facts which an inspection or a correct survey would show, including mechanics' liens, violations of restrictions and rights of parties in adverse possession. If desired the policy will insure specifically against damage resulting from existing violations of building restrictions. In fact, they afford complete protection to the owner of the indebtedness by insuring that his mortgage or trust deed is a valid first lien and protecting him, without qualification, against loss of principal, interest and other secured sums, whether the loss shall arise from any defect or invalidity in the instrument itself or by reason of the failure or unmarketability of the title of the mortgagor or trustor.

Full coverage policies may be issued in favor of the owner. This is seldom requested, as the owner usually feels that he himself has taken care of all matters not covered by the ordinary "Owner's Policy." It is usually the lender's money who insists on complete protection.

As a convenience to the public most title companies, under certain conditions, will insure against existing judgments, attachments, executions and pending litigation which for one reason or another cannot be cleared from the records immediately. In such cases the title company requires indemnity, either bond or cash, to be held until the objectionable encumbrances are removed. In such cases the policy issued, makes no mention of the encumbrance, thus enabling the owner to sell his property or obtain a loan without delay.

The title companies are also frequently called upon to furnish guaranteed reports for special purposes. These are concerned only with the record title. Some of these are:

For the attorney who is foreclosing a mortgage or a mechanic's lien and to protect the mortgagee or lien claimant under the lien, foreclosure reports are issued. A preliminary letter, in itself a guarantee, is sent to the attorney who has placed the order. This letter lists all the necessary or proper parties to the foreclosure action, sets out the nature of their interests, and reports existing taxes or assessments. With this information a proper complaint may be drawn and filed. A supplemental report covers the recording of any Lis Pendens and any matters of record intervening between the date of the first letter. At the same time the formal abstract and guarantee is prepared and issued in favor of the interested party.

In the "foreclosure" (sale by trustee) of a trust deed a different type of guarantee is required by the trustee. It is issued immediately after the filing of the notice of the trustor's default. It contains a short report of title, together with the addresses of lien holders or judgment creditors (or their attorneys) to whom the trustee may wish to mail a notice of the impending sale. The all-important location of the property is shown, whether in a city or judicial township, and the name of a newspaper in which legal publication of the sale may be had.

Mediterranean Type Residence on Exhibition

One of Five Model Homes Displayed

Public inspection of five model homes at The Outpost has been announced for today by the C. E. Toberman Company, developers of the property.

NEW STYLES FEATURE OF HOME SHOW

Many Inspect Furnished, Unfurnished Dwellings as Exposition Opens

After months of planning and work by architects, city planning engineers, home decorators and experts in charge of furnishings and equipment, the Los Angeles Annual Small Homes Exposition was attended by thousands of visitors at the opening in Leimert Park yesterday.

GORDON B. KAUFMANN

Many innovations in home construction, equipment and furnishings are included in the ten dwellings, five of which are furnished by Barker Brothers. The exposition occupies a block on Edgehill Drive, just north of Leimert Boulevard.

The ten exposition homes were designed by Franz Herding, city planning architect, in collaboration with George J. Adams, Gordon B. Kaufman, Roland E. Coate and Carl Jules Weyl, Los Angeles and Hollywood architects. Modern exterior decoration of some of the structures was in charge of Einar Peterson, mural painter.

Other homes are of Italian, Mediterranean, Spanish, French, English and early California architecture.

Conferences Arranged on Farm Topics

The farm-lands division of the California Real Estate Association, headed by Oscar O. Reed, Fresno, has scheduled two conferences to open up the year's activities.

The first conference will be held at Fresno on the 11th inst. An all-day session will include talks by leading authorities, with discussion by the delegates at large. The evening dinner will feature industry. President W. H. Daum of the State association will be the speaker.

Another State farm conference will be held at the Los Angeles Realty Board on March 15, during the California land show. A San Joaquin Valley good-will excursion, under auspices of the Fresno Chamber of Commerce, will leave the day before, stopping at valley points, and arriving in time to attend the conference and land show in a body.

Section Lists Products of Factory Units

Thirty-two manufacturing plants are located in the North Hollywood area which radiates from the Hollywood Country Club-Beverly Del Norte district. Factories listed in a survey made by the Chamber of Commerce include many doing nation-wide business. Among the productions are motor paints and materials, concrete pipe, crushed rock, concrete products, paving, septic tanks, guitars and musical instruments, ornamental iron, meat packers, automobile wheels, builders' tile, motion pictures, breakfast foods, auto delivery bodies and machinery.

In the area adjacent to North Hollywood more than $20,000,000 has been invested in major motion-picture studios and $10,000,000 in aviation industrial development, John H. Blair pointed out.

MONTHLY LIENS PAID DISCLOSED

Survey Shows Payments of January Reach Total of $11,292,917

The first month of 1930, lacking the record of one-half day, Saturday, closed with a total of $11,292,917 released on maturing realty liens by private individuals, who were holders of mortgages and trust deeds, according to the weekly analysis by the Pacific States Savings and Loan Company, based upon data furnished exclusively to The Times by the Mortgage Maturity Company.

The review shows that 2122 liens were discharged, as against 2399 maturing, involving $12,850,530 held by private money lenders. The apparent deficit is assignable to the excess payments of 1929.

In comparison with January, 1929, when payments totaled $21,019,500, there is an apparent decline of $9,726,583, which may be assigned to premature payments of liens due in January and other months of the current year. January 1929 had premature payment of $9,609,856.

The January, 1930, total shows a gain of $2,532,125 compared to payments paid in December, 1929, which totaled $8,760,792.

A reflex from the late bull stock market is again shown in the notices of delinquency filed during the month, which exceeded in number of instruments all months of 1929, with the exception of December and in amounts involved, all months excepting May, 1929. In December, 1929, 129 instruments were affected, as against 124 for January, 1930. In May, 1929, the total value was $1,385,842, as against $969,137 for January, 1930.

Continuation of the present trend is indicated for the first quarter of the year during which those hit by the stock market crash will be undergoing adjustment.

Month Building Held Greatest Ever in Section

With a total of $945,967 in building permits issued during the month of January, Westwood Hills has started the year 1930 with a total far ahead of any January in its history, developers declare.

A total of thirty-seven permits was issued during the month, or an average of approximately one and a half for each working day.

According to Vice-President A. Harold Janss of the Janss Investment Corporation, the year 1930 is more than living up to expectations that it will establish the greatest development record in the history of any similar project in the West. "We have been looking forward to a banner year in subdivision development during 1930 and have backed this belief with an unusually heavy program. The fact that the month of January established such a large building total in spite of unfavorable conditions due to the rains should be satisfactory evidence to every resident of Los Angeles that present favorable prices make for unusually good investments."

CONTRACT AWARDED FOR HOSIERY UNITS

Contract for the construction of the factory of the Mission Hosiery Mills has been awarded to Macdonald & Driver, Los Angeles building contractors. The factory will cost $69,970, and will be erected at the corner of Thirty-seventh Place and Moneta avenue. It will be a five-story and basement structure of Class-A construction. The contractors are members of the Associated General Contractors.

Coast Building Leading Nation for Past Year

The building industry on the Pacific Coast is in a much more favorable position than is the case for the United States as a whole, according to an analysis of recent western and national building records just completed by E. W. Straus & Co. While the total of new building for which permits were issued in 548 principal cities of the United States during 1929 was 11.6 per cent below the comparable figures for 1928, the relative reduction in 105 Pacific Coast cities amounted to but 7.1 per cent.

Figures compiled show a 553-cities total of $3,827,531,447 in building permits issued during 1928, and $3,379,977,311 in 1929, while the 1928 total for 105 Pacific Coast cities was $404,904,563 in 1928, and $375,779,431 in 1929. The Pacific Coast total amounted to 10.5 per cent of the national total in 1928 and 11.1 per cent in 1929.

Fine Homes to Be Opened For Public Visits

The five Mediterranean style model homes in the Outpost in Hollywood, residential park controlled by the C. E. Toberman Company, will be thrown open for public inspection today, according to C. E. Toberman, executive head of the project.

The five model homes are of various sizes containing from eight to eleven rooms. Each residence contains three master bedrooms, and two or more baths, all of them possessing the ultimate in modern equipment and improvements. One of the outstanding features in one of the model homes is an intercommunicating system of telephones. Another one contains a large stone tiled loggia.

Two of these residences are erected on estates of more than 200 feet in depth. The public is invited to make an inspection of these homes today and all week.

Work Begins on La Brea Avenue Widening Plan

Widening of La Brea avenue between Sunset and Hollywood boulevards was started yesterday following the completion of the improvement of La Brea from Sunset south to Fountain avenue. The two widening processes will convert La Brea into a through street of standard boulevard width. The opening and extension of Genesee street through Nichol's Canyon to Mulholland Drive is scheduled to follow the La Brea development.

Completion of the La Brea project will materially increase the flow of traffic on Sunset, Walter Muller of the Sunset Boulevard Association said yesterday. Already Sunset is carrying a capacity traffic load, Muller declared. The Genesee extension also will create new Sunset traffic.

CONTRACTOR DIRECTOR OF ASSOCIATION

Local Man Completing Construction of Project in Long Beach

George W. Kemper, who is finishing the construction of a pumping plant in Long Beach for that city's storm drain system, has been operating in Los Angeles as an engineering contractor for the past six years. He formerly was an engineering contractor in North Dakota and Montana. He is a director of the local chapter of the Associated General Contractors.

GEORGE W. KEMPER

Since Kemper has been in Los Angeles, he has finished contracts involving more than $1,000,000. He deals chiefly with underground construction, such as the building of storm drains and sewer systems. Among the larger projects which he has constructed are the $110,000 Anaheim street storm drain, the $230,000 sanitary sewer in Municipal Improvement District No. 5 at Culver City, the $100,000 sanitary sewer at Federal avenue and Santa Monica Boulevard, and the $110,000 Los Feliz and Glen Eden storm drain.

Kemper also has installed a number of street lighting systems, including the $265,000 lighting system along Sunset Boulevard and the $90,000 lighting system along Long Beach Boulevard in Huntington Park.

WATER PLANT IMPROVEMENT

LINDSAY, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Rehabilitation of the city water plant, long contemplated by City Trustees of Lindsay, will be started soon.

Developers of Island Improvement

Trio Head Syndicate

W. O. Anderson, Lew Anger and I. H. Lyons, pictured above from left to right, respectively, are leaders in the syndicate which recently acquired Lido Isle and which will develop the property.

Sales Leaders Named by Firm

Judge Rush B. McComas and Leonard C. Wakeman have been appointed sales counselor and director of sales, respectively, for the P. W. Griffitts organization, developers of Boeing Square, according to an announcement of P. W. Griffitts last week. The two will assume joint control of sales at once.

ORDINANCE ADOPTED

Ordinance of intention has been adopted by the Los Angeles City Council for the installation of an ornamental-lighting system in La Brea avenue, between Franklin avenue and Fountain avenue.

School Board Orders Plan for New Unit

SAN BERNARDINO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Architect Howard E. Jones, 518 Anderson Boulevard, has been commissioned to prepare plans and specifications for a six-room elementary school building to be erected at the northeast corner of Twenty-eighth and Le Roy streets, for the San Bernardino Board of Education.

The new structure will be of California type of architecture, of brick or concrete construction and will cost approximately $40,000.

Local Manufactured Product Australia Bound

Four Ten-Ton Trucks and Trailers Haul Shipment

Floating decks for mammoth 55,000-barrel oil-storage tanks were shipped from Los Angeles to Australia last week. The decks, made under the Gallagher pontoon patents, were purchased by the British Imperial Oil Company, Ltd., of Sydney, Australia. The Gallagher Company is now a part of Consolidated Steel Corporation, Los Angeles. Four ten-ton trucks and trailers were required to move the crated floating sections of each tank to the harbor. The all-welded units are made to such exact measurements that the workers in the Australian fields, who never before have seen the equipment, will have little difficulty in putting them together. The decks are designed to float on the stored oil and to not only blanket against fire, but also to prevent the escape of valuable volatile gases.

HISTORIC DEATH VALLEY ATTRACTS MOTORISTS

ANNUAL AUTO SHOW OPENS LATE THIS MONTH

Los Angeles Dealer Association Will Display Over 300 Cars at Shrine Auditorium Exhibit

Interest in the remarkable developments in mechanical design which the automotive industry this year offers to the public is stimulated by the announcement yesterday that the eighteenth Auto Show staged by the Los Angeles Motor Car Dealers' Association will open at the Shrine Auditorium on February 22.

During the coming week workmen will start providing an appropriate setting for the array of more than 300 cars that will be displayed at the show. The huge banquet hall, the lower floor, the exhibition floor and the stage of the auditorium will be transformed into a modernistic background for the modern transportation to be given.

MORE NEW MODELS.

That the public has not been slow to recognize the importance of the changes that are offered this year is seen in the decisive attendance records registered at the shows at New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other metropolitan centers. Automotive experts declare that not in five years have so many completely new vehicles been introduced as are offered for 1930. Included in the array which reveals the progressiveness of the industry that has gone forward continuously in providing new and better cars for the public is a sixteen-cylinder car, a car with front drive and many new and interesting eight-cylinder cars of the moderate price fields with both V-type and straight-eight engines.

Thirty-two different makes of cars will be shown by twenty-five different dealer organizations, according to H. W. Tuttle, chairman of the show. Ten commercial vehicle dealers will show their lines. Also an unusually elaborate array of accessory exhibits will be designed by more than fifty firms.

In his task of making show arrangements Chairman Tuttle is being assisted by Hamlin Nerney, Calvin Warren, Earle Carpenter and J. M. Sterling. The manager of the show is Burt Roberts, executive secretary of the dealer association.

EIGHTS IN LEAD

The public's demand for increased power and smoothness is reflected in the list of cars for the show this year. For the first time, cars with eight-cylinder power plants will outnumber the sixes, while during the show more sixes than fours were ordered.

A great deal of factory co-operation is being extended the local dealers by the various factories. Recognizing the importance of Southern California as a trade territory, the factories have arranged to have special show cars and men from the national shows in New York and Chicago.

The show committee has been working on an extensive program of musical entertainment.

WORK BEGUN ON LINK TO BIG BEAR

Final Construction on High-Gear Route Started by Contractors

SAN BERNARDINO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Clearing of the right of way along the proposed course of the double link in the high-gear route to Big Bear Valley, extending across the crest of the San Bernardino Mountains, was begun today by a force of the Lewis Construction Company of Los Angeles, contractors on the project.

The road, the final link in the route from San Berriardino to Big Bear, will cost $180,697. It will extend from a point near Squirrel Inn to Summit Springs Park, near the head of the City Creek Canyon grade. The road will be paved with a 20-foot strip, similar to that used on the road into Big Bear Valley from Redlands.

Because the State and Federal governments are following a program of maintaining the natural beauty of the mountains in highway construction, the route will vary slightly to protect giant pines in the direct path of the roadway. The plan also restricts the contractor from using heavy explosives which would destroy adjacent timber along the course of the road during its construction.

Forest Exams Will be Held

Civil service examinations for junior foresters and junior range examiners to be held in the United States Forest Service are to be held in March, according to announcement just received by the district forester at Berkeley. Applications for the junior examination must be on file with the United States Civil Service Commission at Washington, D. C., not later than February 18, for the junior range examiner later than March 5. Applicants will be notified of the exact date of examinations.

The examinations are to obtain eligibles for vacancies which may occur in any of the 150 national forests as well as for forestry work on Indian reservations, and are being tried by a large number of men at the thirty-five forestry schools of the United States.

Roads in Death Valley Pierce Fascinating Country

Charles H. Owens Pictures Area

Death Valley; Beatty—the old mining town; John Cytus—a character of the district, and interesting "finds" are sketched here by the artist.

WATER, GOLD, MEN LEND ATTRACTION TO AREA

"Johnny Behind the Gun" Offers Typical Example of Various Characters to be Seen

BY AL PARMENTER

"Good-by, death valley."

So spoke the last of the ill-fated Jayhawker party to leave the now famed California desert valley after three months of terror and privation with the shadow of death by starvation and thirst constantly hovering near and sometimes touching members of the pioneer party. And since that unconsciously dramatic exit speech on the Panamint Mountains Death Valley has been the name.

During Spanish reign and even back to early Indian days and down into these days of the United States Death Valley has been famed.

Famed for the toll of life taken when men could not reach water.

Famed for gold.
Famed for silver.
Famed for lead.
Famed for borax.

And famed for the wealth that these minerals produced.

And famed for the men that have lived the life of this valley of terror. Men made and broken.

Men have sought the gold—and found a desolate desert waste that hid both the gold and water, though both gold and water were near. Others have survived the loss and found the gold.

WHAT TYPE OF MEN?

And so we build up the character of men that make Death Valley today.

What are these men? Talk to "Johnny Behind the Gun" and you will know. He is John Cyty, and at the moment is staying in Beatty, Nev., just outside Death Valley.

One of the oldest characters of Death Valley, he has a mine up on Chloride Cliffs overlooking the valley. Johnny is a small man, not quite five feet in height, with pale blue eyes that seem to be faded by the strong sun, but that see far over the open spaces. What Johnny lacks in stature he makes up in speed. He is known as the quickest man on the trigger in all Death Valley. He loves his game of cards, but no phony deals. And when Johnny has a claim staked it is well to respect his rights in the matter. There are many tales of what has happened to men who have been careless with an extra ace or thought to encroach on Johnny's mining properties. There are supposed to be as many notches on his guns as there are fingers on his hands, and the last time it was just a matter of shooting a bit too low, anyway they curtailed Johnny's activities for a while.

ANNOYS JOHNNY

"A darn nuisance to interfere with a man and let spidery tangle up his dishes," Johnny said when he got back to his house in Beatty, after a year's enforced absence after the shooting.

But John Cyty really belongs to that long list of unsung Death Valley heroes, and he has had to learn to be quick on the trigger not only for self-protection but for the protection of the rights of others. For twenty long sizzling summers John Cyty guarded the old water hole at Stovepipe Wells, a mile and a half south of where Stovepipe Wells resort is now situated. In the searing sun of July and August such as no other man could endure, Johnny rode for forty miles on his burro down to Stovepipe Wells to see that the shovel was still there for any wanderer who might otherwise perish in the agony.

SALON OPENS SATURDAY

Coachwork Feature of Annual Event to be Held at Biltmore for Week

With a showing of world-famous chasses mounting the latest creations in custom coachwork by prominent European and American carrossiers, the annual staging of the Automobile Salon on the Pacific Coast will open at the Biltmore Saturday to continue until the 15th.

This is the silver anniversary of this famous exhibition in America and the exhibitors have spared no effort to present motor cars de luxe. The function of the annual salon is in introducing the new styles in coachwork. This season the new body creations of a score of the world's greatest carrossiers were first presented at Paris and London and more recently at Chicago and New York.

The makes of chassis which will be seen in the 1930 salon include the following: Cadillac, Chrysler Imperial, Cord, Duesenberg, Franklin, La Salle, Lincoln, Mercedes, Packard, Pierce-Arrow, Rolls-Royce, and Stutz. The custom coachmakers having special exhibits are: Brewster, Brunn, Derham, Dietrich, Fisher, Fleetwood, Judkins, Le Baron, Locke, Murphy, Weymann, and Willoughby. In addition various foreign chasses will mount coachwork by prominent European carrossiers.

While interest in the automobile salon is largely centered in the new styles and types in custom coachwork, this season there are presented important new developments in chassis engineering and construction. Among these are the new front wheel-drive cars, new braking systems, and marked improvements in transmissions and spring suspension.

CALIFORNIA TO RECEIVE ROAD FUNDS

State's Apportionment for Federal Forest Work Will Be Large

California will receive $676,451 for construction of forest roads in and adjacent to the national forests during 1931, according to the Automobile Club of Southern California.

California's allotment of $676,451 is the largest to be received by any State. Oregon will receive $631,987, Idaho $490,985 and Montana $396,612 and Washington $331,368. Southern States are given $115,641 of the total appropriation of $4,500,000 with the Lake States and Middle West being allowed $63,508 and the Eastern States $30,769.

This money, which will be available after July 1, will be devoted to construction or maintenance of roads and trails to facilitate travel to and in the national parks.

Presentation of Scenery Owners' Aim

PORTERVILLE, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Co-operation of landowners along both sides of the highway from Porterville to Springville is to be sought by the Porterville Chamber of Commerce in preserving this lateral as a scenic thoroughfare. President A. T. Margo of the chamber recently asked the good roads comittee of the organization to interview landowners and secure their signatures to a pledge refusing the posting of signboards on their property bordering the highway. J. C. Brown is chairman of this committee.

The Springville highway is part of one designated by the Tulare County Board of Supervisors to be kept free from such signs. It leads from Porterville to Camp Nelson via Springville, and from Springville to Balch Park.

BUFFALO TO HOLD AVIATION SHOW

Sanction for a Class C aircraft show to be held at Buffalo, N. Y., March 22 to 29, has been granted by the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce, it was announced by Charles L. Lawrance, chairman of the show committee of the chamber. The Buffalo show will be held at the Buffalo Auditorium. Headquarters for the show have been established at Hotel Statler.

Phoenix Route Improvements Now Complete

PHOENIX, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The Mecca-Blythe road is in fine condition, enabling the average driver to reach this city from Los Angeles in about fourteen hours. This evidence has been brought by three commercial body secretaries, who made the trip together. They are James L. Davis of the Riverside county Chamber of Commerce, Earl W. Porter of the Riverside Chamber of Commerce and Arthur E. Isham of the Redlands Chamber of Commerce. From Mecca eastward are four miles of paving, then thirty-two miles of fast graveled road and then an oil-mix surface to Blythe. On the Arizona side has been improvement for twelve miles and thence to Bouse, a hard gravel road. Only west of Aguila for a few miles is there going that is at all heavy. From Wickenburg to Phoenix is fine highway or concrete road. The commercial bodies represented are active in forwarding improvement of the Blythe route, with declaration that it is the best and fastest from the coast into Central Arizona.

BUYING TREND WATCHED

Automobile Manufacturers and Finance Concerns Keep Closely in Touch With Market

DETROIT, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—With the three major automobile shows now out of the way, manufacturers and dealers are turning their attention to production and sales.

Although January continued remarkably quiet the industry as a whole showed a slight improvement over the closing month of 1929, and an optimistic attitude toward operations in 1930 gradually is becoming more widespread and is being expressed with increasing confidence. This optimism is conservative, however, and there is no indication that the manufacturers will let it get an upper hand and make them forget necessary precautions. The buying trend is being more closely watched than ever before, particularly by finance organizations whose business is financing the sales of automobiles.

Although the month of January registered a slight increase in total output, it was far from satisfactory as a whole. The two leading producers in the low price field were the most fortunate ones, and report an increase over December in their daily schedules of from 10 to 15 per cent, and one of them has a production schedule for February which calls for a 20 per cent increase over January.

OUTPUT HEAVIER

In all, about seven companies showed heavier output. An equal number showed no change whatever from the December figures and the

PASADENA PLANNING TO MAKE STREETS BEAUTIFUL

Making the city more beautiful is a prime consideration in Pasadena where plans are going forward to plant ornamental trees in street parkings in the business areas, according to advices reaching the Automobile Club of Southern California.

This movement has support from the City Planning Commission and from the municipal park department and various civic organizations.

Glendale and other neighboring cities are starting similar projects.

AUTO PRODUCTION GAINS

Detroit Factories Report Increases in Output During Week; Confidence Growing

DETROIT, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Another sharp increase in total automotive output occurred this week as the two leading producers in the low-priced field instituted daily schedule step-ups ranging from 10 to 15 per cent, according to B. H. Cram, president of Cram's Automotive Reports, Inc., industry authority.

One of these concerns revised its monthly set-up upward to 30 per cent in excess of the original figure fixed, as incoming orders continued to gain. In all about seven companies showed heavier production, one gain being the result of the resumption of regular activity.

One company in the high-priced field increased its daily output 15 per cent and announced that a further gain will be shown next week. The largest gain was reported by a company in the medium-priced field, showing an increase of 30 per cent in its daily output. The remaining concerns continued production at unchanged levels, but virtually all stated that unfilled orders assure the attainment of the January set-up. By the first of February fairly heavy output will be general and, with the present rate of orders continuing, should proceed steadily upward.

As production gained, employment at the factories also showed a further increase to more nearly normal levels. Many plants already are employing their regular full force of men and the depression existing in December soon will have disappeared.

An optimistic attitude toward the industry's operations in 1930 gradually is becoming more widespread and is being expressed with increasing confidence. This optimism is conservative, however, and there is no indication that the manufacturers will let it get an upper hand and make them forget necessary precautions. The buying trend is being watched closely, particularly by finance organizations, who finance sales of new automobiles.

Current conditions and those expected to prevail throughout the year point to this being a better year for the dealer than had been expected, with the recent numerous price increases affording a greater margin or profit in many lines and controlled production doing much to allay fears of being overburdened with stocks.

SHORT DIET DETOUR

On the Pala-Rincon-Henshaw Road there is a short dirt detour just east of Pala which is, however, causing no particular difficulty at the present time.

Anti-Puncture Machine Wins

An antipuncture nail picking machine operated by the State of New Mexico recently made a tour of the principal streets of a city in the eastern part of the State. Upon weighing the load gathered it was found to the amazement of civic officials that 1698 pounds of puncture-making material had been gleaned from the city's streets.

DURANT LINE ENTIRELY NEW

First Offerings for 1930 Being Displayed

Factory Continues Cars in Low Price Field

Many Innovations Feature Company's Autos

New in every detail, even to the name plate emblem on the radiator, Durant's first offering for 1930, the Six Fourteen series of motor cars, will be revealed to the Pacific Coast public today.

The new series is the first complete offering under the direction of F. J. Haynes, A. I. Philp and their associates. The line consists of sedan, coupe and roadster in both standard and de luxe models and a business coupe.

LOW PRICES CONTINUE

The new offerings continue the Durant in the low-price field. The five-passenger, four-door sedan, completely equipped with numerous accessories and spare tire, lists for less than $1000, delivered on the Pacific Coast.

The exterior body appearance reveals accentuated horizontal lines with vertical lines subdued. Sweeping curves and spear-point decorative motif suggest speed.

Wide doors provide easy access to roomy interiors and when seated the passenger has ample head and leg room. Proper location of the seats with respect to the slender steel pillars makes the visibility good. The windshield is of the V-V type and slightly inclined to prevent objectionable reflections. Windshield, door and rear quarter windows are controlled by crank-type regulators.

ADJUSTABLE FRONT SEATS

Front seats are adjustable fore and aft to satisfy individual requirements.

The Durant engine mounted in unit construction with a multiple spring, rubber cushioned single plate clutch and three-speed transmission, is tilted back to sufficient angle to afford a straight line drive under normal loading. The tubular propeller shaft employs two all-metal inclosed type universal joints.

Springs are 38x1¾ inches front and 58x2 inches rear. Each spring has seven leaves of heat treated steel, the gauge of metal being graduated in proportion to the load. Shackles are self-adjusting to take up for wear and to insure against looseness and noise. Four double-acting hydraulic shock absorbers, with rubber-cushioned ball and socket connecting rods are used.

STEELDRAULIC BRAKES

Steeldraulic brakes operate on eleven-inch pressed steel drums which are flanged to insure against distortion and to afford good heat radiation. Inclosed mechanism excludes grit and wear and insures against undue wear of the full molded brake facings and drums.

The rubber-mounted engine has a bore and stroke of 3¾x4 inches, giving a piston displacement of 199 cubic inches. The 2⅝-inch crankshaft is rigidly supported on interchangeable type, babbit-lined, bronze main bearings.

Invar strut aluminum alloy pistons are each fitted with three compression rings and one oil control ring.

Camshafts are driven by a silent type chain, kept constantly flooded with lubricant through a special passage from the oil main. Adjustable valve lifters have chilled iron bands and are mounted in sets of six on easily removable brackets. Valve stem guides are also removable. Exhaust valves are of silichrome alloy and intakes of chrome nickel.

Engine lubrication is by gear-driven pump which delivers oil under pressure to the oil main and from which other passages lead to the crankshaft main bearings, camshaft bearings and timing chain. Spray thrown from the rapidly revolving cranks on the drilled crankshaft, lubricates cylinder walls, pistons, valve mechanism and other working parts inside the engine. An easily replaceable oil filter is fitted to keep the oil free from foreign substances and an crankcase ventilator connected with the carburetor air intake, draws any vaporised fuel or water from the case.

CYLINDER DESIGN

The cylinder design provides clear circulation of water around all the cylinder walls, valve seats and valve-lifter guides. The circulating pump is bolted directly to the block, well aft, to insure equal distribution of cooling water throughout the jackets and uniform temperature of the different cylinders. A thermostat in the cylinder water outlet connection restricts the circulation until the engine attains the proper working temperature.

The cylinder head of the new engine, due to the "Pyrodyne" design, makes possible the compression ratio of 5.3 to 1, without detonation with ordinary grades of fuel.

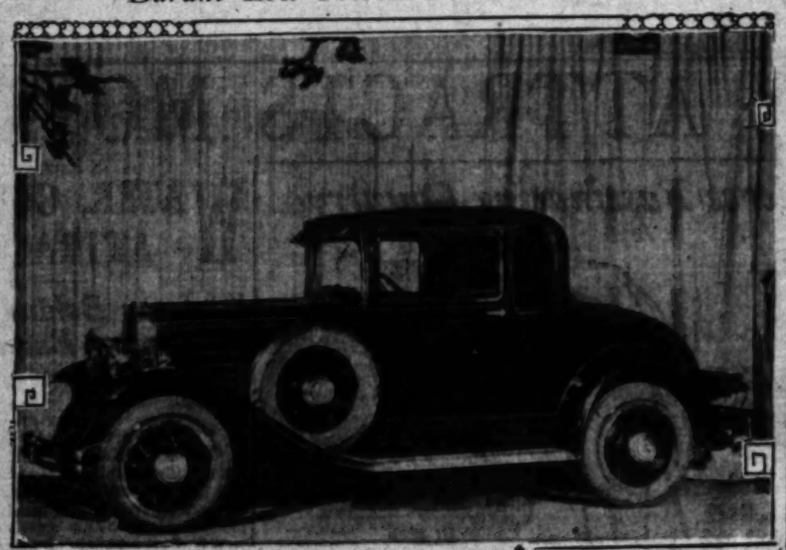
Fuel from the twelve-gallon tank to the carburetor is by positively driven, diaphragm pump. Visible fuel filter, with easily removable glass bowl, and self-discharging fixed vane, centrifugal type air cleaner are fitted to the new Durant model.

Radiator shells, head-lamp rims, bumpers and all bright exterior metal parts are chrome-plated over nickel. Hub caps are bright-finished aluminum alloy. The spear point motif, which characterizes the art treatment of the car, is carried out on lamps, radiator cap, starting crank hole cover and on the polished nickel window regulator, inside door handles and the instrument panel. The rim of the instrument panel glass and the hardware escutcheons are in harmony with the Durant emblem and spear point motif. Symetrically grouped on an attractive, indirectly-lighted, nickel-trimmed, glass-covered panel on the dash are electric fuel gauge and engine temperature indicator as well as the usual ammeter, oil pressure gauge and speedometer.

Spark and throttle control and carburetor choke are on the dash, as is also the co-incidental lock. The switch, controlling the tilting beam of the head lamps, is on the toe board near the accelerator pedal.

Rear tire carrier is provided on standard models while the two spare wheels of the de luxe types are carried in fender wells. The hub caps of the wood wheels of the standard types are of polished aluminum alloy and those for the wire wheels are chrome-plated, as are also the lamp bodies and the full chrome-plated parking lights on the fenders.

Durant Low Priced Six Arrives Here



Changes in Car Numerous

The coupe is typical of all de luxe models, which have wire wheels, fender lights and extra wheels mounted in fender wells. Below, the horizontal lines of the body are accentuated and the curves are exceptionally graceful. The body is of steel and hardwood construction. The spear-point motif replaces the customary style of hood louvers.

Trailer Hobo Latest Type of Vagrant

A new kind of hobo, one who rides the axles of gas trucks instead of the rods under freight cars, has been discovered. Passing a gasoline truck near an airport when he saw a man riding on the coupling between the truck and the large tank trailer, an officer stopped the truck and escorted the passenger to the railroad right of way.

A little later in the morning the officer saw the same man again. This time he was underneath the tank on the trailer and was riding on the rear axles of the vehicle. Again he was removed and headed down the railroad track, the officer standing guard until the truck was on its way.

MOTORISTS GIVEN DATA ON ROUTES

Information Furnished Concerning Ways to Get to Winter Sports

Advice on roads, conditions, grades and other useful information to the thousands of motorists in Southern California who plan attending the fourth annual winter sports carnival of the Los Angeles Junior Chamber of Commerce, to be held next Friday, Saturday and Sunday at Big Pines Camp, the county's mountain recreation camp, has been given out by the junior chamber officials.

There are two ways of going—over the San Bernardino and Saugus routes. For Los Angeles motorists it is advised that two roads can be taken from the city to San Bernardino, either Valley Boulevard or Foothill Boulevard. This route then continues on up and over Cajon Pass to Camp Cajon. One-half mile from Camp Cajon turn left at Auto Club sign marked "L. A. County Recreation Camp, 15 Miles," via Lone Pine Canyon to the Big Pines Camp.

Motorists will find an average good road from Camp Cajon on, although it is not paved. It contains no dangerous curves or switchbacks. An average grade of 7 to 9.8 per cent will be found. At a place halfway up the grade motorists will find a water trough and it is advised for all motorists to fill their radiators before leaving home, filling again at foot of grade, then again halfway up at the trough and to carry along a spare canteen full. It is also advised to have a full set of skid chains along. This route is ninety-six miles from Los Angeles. The elevation at Big Pines is 6200 feet.

The latest report on snowfalls was that eight additional inches fell during the storm of last week-end. Motorists staying overnight at the camp are advised to drain the water from their radiators at night or put in radiators any good brand of antifreeze solution. Radiators are not likely to freeze during the daylight hours.

Autoists taking the longer route or going by way of Saugus and Palmdale are advised to go by way of San Fernando Road (if leaving from Los Angeles) to Newhall, thence to Saugus, thence over Mint Canyon road to Palmdale, then on to Little Rock to Valyermo, via direct road marked "Big Pines Recreation Camp, 15 Miles." In last report from Palmdale no skid chains were essential.)

A good road from Valyermo on to the camp will be found, although not paved. Average grades encountered will be 6 to 8 deg. The distance from Los Angeles by this route is 108 miles.

Motors Work for President

There isn't a machine in any of his factories that C. W. Nash, president of the Nash Motors Company, cannot operate, according to his associates. Recently a costly battery of machines newly installed refused to operate properly even for their own manufacturer, who superintended their installations.

"Hand me a pair of overalls," Mr. Nash directed when told of the difficulty. When he took the jumpers off the new battery of machines was purring smoothly. They have never since become temperamental.

Construction of New Road to Be Started

DUCOR, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Construction of the new highway, traversing Kern county from a point near Ducor, near the Tulare-Kern border, on the northern boundary to Poso Creek, and connecting with the Woody road, will be started soon, according to recent informal agreement by Supervisors of Tulare and Kern counties. This highway will provide a new short cut to the northern counties.

Connecting with the Porterville highway near Ducor, the new highway will run south from the northern boundary of Kern county on through the Rag Gulch country and then over to Poso Creek.

Contracts for Road Work Let

PHOENIX, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—A number of contracts have been awarded by the State Highway Commission for improvement of the Phoenix-Yuma highway, on which a number of the rougher sections are to be oiled at once. The first job is the oil surfacing of eighteen miles in eastern Yuma county. The old Agua Fria bridge on the same road will be closed in a few days, replaced by a modern structure that avoids a previous bad turn west of Cashion. Recent rains have been of advantage to the traveler in laying dust that had become a serious problem.

GRAHAM SHOWS NEW LINE HERE

Sixes and Eights Appear in Company Display

Principal Changes Made in Radiator Line

Great Benefits to be Found in Riding Comfort

Displayed for the first time today in the showrooms of the Graham-Paige Company of Southern California are two new medium-priced six-cylinder Graham eights just announced by the Graham-Paige Motor Corporation as an addition to the line of two Graham sixes and two larger eights, which share with the new models in distinctive refinements in style and important chassis developments. All passenger cars now bear the name "Graham" alone. All bodies, engines and chassis are built in Graham plants.

The outstanding feature of the improvement, according to J. M. Hoehn, general manager for the Graham-Paige Motor Corporation of Southern California, is that non-shatterable safety plate glass will be used in every window, door and windshield of all models, so that every car will be completely armored against the hazards of flying splinters and fragments of glass.

NEW DEVELOPMENTS

Other new developments are as follows:

Box front-end effect, with redesigned radiators, head lamps, fender lines and bumpers, combined to form a unified ensemble.

Improved new body frames construction, assembled with bolts so placed as to be easily accessible for replacements or repairs.

Four type rubber suspension at forward end of front springs of the sixes, and at both ends of all four springs of the new eights.

Chassis frames heavily braced at intersection with deep cross member supporting the clutch housing, in the sixes and eights.

Advanced engineering in manifolding, carburetion and heat control in the new eight-cylinder engines.

Automatic-adjustment automatic choke type carburetor on the six-cylinder and eights.

For chassis designations, taking the place of the former numerical series, are now used. The complete line comprises the following chassis models, each with a variety of bodies:

Standard six, three speeds.
Special six, four speeds.
Standard eight, three speeds.
Special eight, four speeds.
Custom eight, four speeds.
Custom eight, four speeds.

PRINCIPAL CHANGES

In appearance the principal changes are in the radiator, which retains the typical V-shape "cut-away" effect, but is entirely new in design. The shell has been lengthened vertically and is curved across the front. In all the eights, the radiators repeat the chief features of the radiator. In the new eights and special six, the parking lights, mounted on the fenders, are miniatures of the headlamps. The emblem ornament at the center of an ornate aluminum-plated tie-rod, between the headlamps. Automatic radiator shutters with vertical vanes are fitted in all the four-speed eights.

Body styles models include a two-passenger coupe on the standard six and a newly designed rumble-seat coupe on the special six.

Sedans on the special eight and custom six introduce numerous interesting features. In the rear compartment of the front seat is a roomy compartment, with a door held by a spring catch. Two other compartments are built into the cowl panels. The dome light, besides having the usual toggle switch, is arranged to light automatically when the trunkeau door is opened.

NEW DESIGN SYSTEM

The new bodies, built in the Graham plants, are designed on a system that departs from ordinary practice. Accessibility, long ago attained in chassis construction, has been achieved in the body work also. Instead of being fastened together with wood screws, which can be reached after the welded metal panels are applied, the heavy inner members of the body structure are fastened with bolts so located that they may be reached from the interior of the car by removing the trim.

The new eight-cylinder engine, while of conventional eight-in-line design, incorporates many features not found in general practice. Bore and stroke are 2 1-4 and 4½; displacement 268.6. The main bearings are 2.62 inches in diameter; crankpins measure 2.25 inches.

The water-jacketing is unusual in that it extends the full depth of the barrels, so that the entire piston travel is always within a water-cooled area.

MANIFOLD FEATURES

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the new eights are the manifold design and fuel system. The intake manifold was developed over a long time during which it was proved that a new effectiveness was gained by a direct departure from ordinary practice. The cross-section of the gas passage through the manifold is rectangular, the bottom surface being wide and flat, while the changes of direction are made at acute angles instead of through gently curved bends, so that the flow is sharply reversed just before it enters the ports.

The new exhaust manifold, unlike the Graham practice, discharges at a central outlet, instead of at the forward end. The exhaust gas may be discharged directly through the manifold, or be diverted through a compartment surrounding the carburetor riser. A thermostat-controlled butterfly valve regulates the flow of gas. This heat-control valve the hot gases from all the cylinders.

NEW CARBURETOR

A new carburetor is fitted to the eights and special sixes and trucks. There is only one variable jet, instead of two or even three. The correct setting to give good idling performance is all that is required to assure proper operation through the entire range of driving.

The sixes and new eights have a new cross-member of unusual form at the critical point of the chassis frame, where a strong brace is of greatest advantage, but is usually omitted because of the difficulty of design and assembly. The new cross-member is of heavy gauge steel, flanged top and bottom, forming a deep girder-like plate, strongly gusseted at each end. The center is open, so that the cross-member surrounds the clutch housing, just forward of the transmission. In this position it is particularly effective, as it relieves the rear engine mounting and gives the forward part of the body a rigid foundation.

SPRING SHACKLES

The rubber spring shackles, used at all points of the new eight and at the forward ends of both front springs in the sixes, are of a new form, not previously used in the industry. Each pin runs through two cylindrical blocks of live rubber, which fit within an outer housing. The rubber is compressed, gripping firmly the whole surface of the pin and the fixed end plates or shackles. The rubber is completely inclosed in metal, protected from moisture and grit. The required rotary action is permitted by the flow of the rubber. The need for lubrication is entirely eliminated and as there is no wear, the shackles do not become loose to cause rattling and side sway.

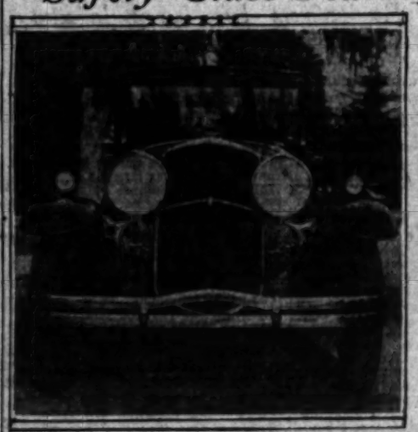
The greatest benefits are in the riding, for there is no metal-to-metal contact between the running gear and the chassis frame, so that the body is completely insulated from the noise and minute vibrations that ordinarily are transmitted to the frame and body from the tires, road surface or rear axle gears.

The hoods of both the new eights, instead of having open louvers, are equipped with door-type ventilators, four on each side. When closed they lie flush with the hood. They may be opened separately by pressing small chromium-plated buttons, one for each door. Thus a wide variety in ventilation, to suit weather conditions, is available.

HOLTVILLE OILING DONE

The oiling which has been in effect for some time just east of Holtville has been completed.

Safety Glass Feature of New Line of Graham Cars



Front View Changed

DEATH VALLEY ATTRACTS

ies of thirst. Only the desert man knows what it means for the shovel to be in the water hole—and careless men learned that Johnny meant that shovel to remain there—that was the self-assumed duty of John Cyty, without pay or glory.

When H. W. Eichbaum brought in a well flowing 250 barrels of water a day and turned on the electric lights at his Stovepipe Wells resort John Cyty felt his work had been done and returned to his mine up on Chloride Cliffs.

FISH STORIES

Now he has been sick with influenza. But he does not go to bed to be sick. Sought for a chat a few days ago he was found lying fully dressed on a large card table in one of the prospector's hangouts in Beatty. He walked out on the street and, once started, told (as truth) what sounded like some of the world's best fish stories. Here's one:

Johnny's dog Bingo was a mixed breed, fox terrier and whippet, and was so smart he could understand English. For example, overhearing Johnny say that a floor board he was placing was too short—the dog was placing was too short—the dog walked out of the building, across the street and dragged back a floor board so long it would not go in the building.

Another—Riding on his donkey one hot day (so hot that when he stood on the sand he had to keep dancing as on a hot stove) his feet protruded through the stirrups far enough that the sun blistered his toes, through his shoes. Then continuing in the same direction the afternoon found the sun at his back and his heels were blistered.

Johnny tells that his first mine was located in the Wolfskill Mountains near Darwin and that he sold it for $30,000.

SHOES BY DOZEN

He buys his shoes in even dozen lots and has them custom made to fit his small feet. Each shoe has a double sole and double heel. Starting on a prospecting trip he says he takes all twelve pairs along and stays out until all are worn out.

Death Valley is reached from Los Angeles by way of Mint Canyon to Mojave, 104 miles out; then through Red Rock Canyon to Olancha or Lone Pine, the road turning at either of these points to Death Valley. Lone Pine is 218 miles from Los Angeles. The trip can be broken by an overnight stop at Lone Pine if the start has not been early enough to make it desirable to go on into the valley. Going through in one day it is shorter to turn off at Olancha.

Leaving Owens Valley the auto road leads through Keeler from Lone Pine and shortly after leaving Keeler connects with the Olancha road to go on into Darwin. Then the Argus and Panamint Mountains are crossed, the road leading through the Zinc Hill area soon after leaving Darwin.

ESCAPE FROM DEATH

It was here that the pioneers in '49 found the dry falls as the last obstacle to their journey into California. It was here that they lowered wagons and oxen over a thirty-foot cliff after at last finding an exit through Townsend Pass after three months' imprisonment in what they had termed the valley of death.

Soon the road connects with the wider and smoother toll road built by H. W. Eichbaum. Finally this stretch of road brings the car to the foot of Emigrant Wash, where Death Valley proper first comes into view.

For the last three-quarters of a century Stovepipe Wells was known as the only water hole within a radius of forty miles. An old prospector marked the spot where water could be found with a broken piece of stove pipe so that other wanderers could find the water.

SAFE PLACE NOW

Civilization is entering the valley. Roads are easy for present-day automobiles. Modern accommodations such as those at Stovepipe Wells are equipped to provide all the comforts. With the automobile available the distances in the valley are diminished to remove the dangers faced by foot travelers. And in these winter months the weather is pleasant, with none of the extreme heat of the summer months.

Some of the attractions are the mines, some abandoned, some being worked and many producing great wealth. There are many mysteries connected with these mines. Those visiting the valley will get all these stories he wishes to listen to.

There are the sand dunes, high as large city buildings, ever-shifting masses of sand.

There are mountains with peculiar canyons—Titus Canyon, long and leading to Leadfield, that is so narrow and twisting it is hard to believe a road could pierce it, yet a car can be easily driven its length. Marble Canyon, an entirely different type and reputed to be the secret location of a rich mine. Mosaic Canyon, a nature's freak.

OLD MINING TOWNS

There are active and deserted mining towns or their remains near by—Rhyolite and Bullfrog of the deserted type. Beatty and Zinc Hill still in production. There are others.

Salt beds some 400 feet below sea level and within less than 100 miles of the highest point in this country, Mt. Whitney, of over 14,000 feet elevation.

All of it within a distance less than 300 miles from Los Angeles and connected by good roads that require but a day for the drive.

BRIDGES AT VISALIA OPEN TO TRAFFIC

DOUGLAS (Ariz.) Feb. 1. (Ex-Two new concrete bridges on the Visalia-Farmersville highway in Tulare county opened to traffic early in December. These bridges are south of Magley's service station and were constructed according to State standards. County Surveyor T. Wayne Switzer also announced starting of work on two other small bridges in the county. One, over the Traver Canal near Dinuba, will be open to traffic about the middle of January. The other, over Extension Ditch near Farmersville, will be finished about the same time.

Total Given on Production of Autos in 1929

Production of motor vehicles in the United States during 1929 totaled 5,358,361 passenger cars, trucks and taxicabs, according to national figures reaching the Automobile Club of Southern California.

This figure compares with 4,358,758 for the preceding year, establishing a new high record output for all time, according to the final United States Department of Commerce report.

The output of passenger cars for the year amounted to 4,566,020, as against 3,621,126 in 1928, while the production of trucks increased from 530,910 to 784,732 in the same period. A notable development was the production of taxicabs, which increased from 6713 in 1928 to 17,589 in 1929.

While the output of passenger cars last November and December took a sharp decline, the monthly average for 1929 was greater than in any previous month in the history of the industry, it is stated.

Four Speeds in Gear Shift Benefits Told

Addressing a recent meeting of automotive engineers, Cornelius E. Tierney of the Graham-Paige Motor Corporation, explained the practical advantages of four-speed transmissions such as are used on some of the Graham cars. He compared two cars, one having four speeds, the other three.

He considered a 4000-pound three-speed car equipped by its manufacturer with a 4.88:1 axle-ratio which was regarded as giving excellent performance with that ratio. At a car speed of sixty-five miles per hour the engine speed is 3500 revolutions per minute, which is considerably faster than the speed at the peak of the horse-power curve. With a 3.69:1 ratio as used with four-speed transmission, the engine speed at sixty-five miles per hour is only 2700 revolutions per minute and the peak of the horse-power curve has not then been reached, while the torque curve has dropped only a small amount.

remainder showed a slight decrease. One company in the high-price field increased production 19 per cent and strange as it may seem the largest gain was reported by the middle-price field. Leaders in the industry see no cause for nervous excitement in present-day conditions, because of the weather conditions. This winter has been probably the most severe—colder and with considerably more snow—the automobile industry has ever experienced and besides automobile buyers are showing no inclination to "rush the market" as they were doing one year ago.

From a dealer's viewpoint the conditions expected to prevail throughout the year point to a better season for them than was earlier expected. With the numerous price changes affording a greater margin of profit in many lines and controlled production which allays fears of being overburdened with cars, the pathway of the great army of dealers has been considerably smoothed. The big problem—the used-car question—is still with them.

A new line of special built cars has been placed on the market by the Packard Motor Car Company, known as Packard Speedsters. Included in the line are five new body types, two runabouts, a phaeton, victoria and sedan. They are practical for everyday use, but especially built for those with a desire to get from one place to another in the shortest length of time. The cars have custom-built bodies with an unlimited choice of color. They are on 134-inch wheel base.

A substantial lowering of prices of the Whippet line of automobiles is announced, ranging from $45 to $50 and thereby adds additional competition in the low-price field where, at the present time, most of the activities in the automobile are centered.

Whippet officials are stepping up production because of the steadily increasing demand. Ford's schedule calls for an output of 310,000 units in February and March. Chevrolet reports daily increases in production of its line of sixes.

Engineering problems vitally related to the future development of the motor car industry occupied the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the Society of Automotive Engineers held in this city. Among the major subjects which received considerable attention was the threatened introduction of Diesel engines, changes in carburetion, the use of tungsten carbide steel, improvement in comfort-giving qualities and front-wheel drive.

An address by Alfred Reeves general manager of the National Automotive Chamber of Commerce, dealing with the automobile outlook for 1930 furnished the climax of the meeting.

Light-weight Diesel engines have already been built which are suitable for use in motor vehicles and the likelihood exists, according to automotive engineers, that substantial savings in fuel costs made possible by this type of engine will soon be extended to owners of passenger and commercial cars.

Supervisors Asked to Buy Playground

A resolution has been sent from Roscoe to the County Supervisors by the Major Development Association, which has been sponsoring the project, suggesting the transformation of the recently acquired 160-acre Hansen tract in th eBig Tujunga basin into a new county park and playground. This is the tract purchased on which to build the road to be used to haul heavy materials to the Big Tujunga dam site. The tract is at the bottom of what is declared to be one of the most beautiful canyons in Southern California, and it extends for more than a mile along the bottom of the canyon.

Hansen's lodge, one of the landmarks in the canyon, is included in the purchase and this can easily be turned into a public recreation building at a small cost, it is stated.

Hansen's lodge is three miles from Switzer's Camp and three miles directly north of Oak Wilds. It is reached by following the bottom of Tujunga Canyon, the inlet being directly north of Sunland. In times past thousands of Los Angeles and Hollywood people have visited the canyon to gather mistletoe. Many large oak trees are in the canyon. The dam site is about a mile north of the lodge, and a small stream is crossed a dozen times or more in reaching the lodge from Sunland.

AVIATION

MORE VISIBILITY IN AIR REQUIRED

Industry Endeavoring to Solve Problem

Elimination of "Blind Spots" Being Sought

Plane Passengers See Less Than Pilots

BY FRANK J. CAMODY

Department of Commerce records show that in 1928 there was a total of 1062 aircraft accidents reported. Of these ninety-three, or nearly 9 per cent, represented collision either in the air or on the ground. With reference to collision mishaps, it is pointed out that they constitute the most conspicuous variety of aircraft accidents. In the first place, two planes are involved with the consequence that the number of persons affected normally is greater. A second significant factor in making such mishaps impressive is that plane structures are more likely to be seriously affected in a collision, with resultant greater loss of life.

With these facts well in mind and realising the general principle that the faster the vehicle the greater must be the visibility provided its pilot, the industry is concentrating considerable attention on the problem. Its design authorities are well aware of the need for greater visibility as the number of planes in service increases. In this connection it will be recalled that one of the most significant changes in motor car body design grew out of need to eliminate 'blind spots" in front of the driver and that that change created a new problem which has been remedied only this year by general adoption of the sloping windshield.

"BLIND SPOTS" BOTHER

Airplane "blind spots" received considerable unfavorable publicity during the World War, some observers point out. The common practice in pursuit piloting those days, the most conspicuous variety of aerial warfare, was for the pilot to get the enemy's blind spot and thus slip up on him unawares. Surprise was the desirable element in attack.

Because there were blind spots in all planes, surprise was accountable for more victories than anyone realizes.

There are fewer blind spots in today's airplanes, but by no means all have been eliminated as anyone who ever has flown as pilot or passenger knows. Some types of plane have better visibility than others. The low, high, or middle-wing monoplane, however, has its positions from which the pilot cannot see. So does the biplane. It makes no difference whether the craft is a cabin type or an open cockpit type; there are blind spots, though more in one than another.

POSITIONS DIFFERENT

The passenger, who can see this for himself as he sits in the cockpit or cabin, has less cause for alarm over the lack of visibility apparent to him. His position in the plane and that of the pilot are different. The pilot can see considerably more from where he sits. Furthermore, he is familiar with the process of compensating for his lack of vision; that is, before he changes his direction it is his practice to note carefully what is likely to be in his path when his vision is reduced. In turning, for example, the wing is raised, cutting off the pilot's view. In nearly every instance, however, he has made certain that nothing is going to appear suddenly in the area which he cannot see.

Passengers, however, do not always know this. They see the other plane but are not certain that the pilot does. Pilots, who have ridden as passengers have experienced this sensation quite as definitely as have other aircraft users, who know nothing of handling a plane.

Naturally, the feeling of fear induced by lack of visibility is greatest around an airport and it is intensified in direct proportion to the number of planes in the vicinity at the moment. Anyone who ever has flown above an airport which is the scene of an air meet of any kind is acutely aware of this fact. With the air crowded with planes, the passenger can be guaranteed all the thrills he desires.

DANGER AVOIDED

Few accidents, however, happen under such circumstances although the stage would seem to be perfectly set. The small number of mishaps, however, is due to the fact that the pilot is acutely aware of the danger and in every case is trying to avoid it.

"The real danger," says a veteran pilot, who does not mind "traffic" in the least, "comes when two pilots get on each other's blind spot. The point, of course, is not to do it. The pilot is trying hard not to commit such folly when the traffic is heavy. The passenger can count on that."

The air traffic rules which govern the operation of licensed craft and licensed pilots are definitely drawn with a view to preventing collisions. They specify, contrary to the opinion of many lay observers, that planes in passing shall not fly above or below each other but 300 feet apart on the same level.

The purpose is obvious.

The most hopeful sign with regard to improved visibility in aircraft is that everyone in the industry is aware that it is needed.

Plane Company to Increase Production

DETROIT, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Announcement was made today by William A. Mara, vice-president of the Stinson Aircraft Corporation, that the company will increase its production 300 per cent in 1930. The Stinson company is a unit of the Cord Corporation, and claims to be the largest builder of cabin airplanes in the world.

More than $1,000,000 in advertisements have been let by the Stinson company to cover the first three months of the program, Mara said. This is the largest volume ever let by a commercial American aircraft manufacturer.

Final negotiations for control of the Stinson company by the Cord Corporation were effected early in November and marked the entrance of E. L. Cord and his associates into the aviation field in a large way. Cord, president of Auburn, is also president of the Cord Corporation.

Fighting Airplane Sets New Speed Standard.

World's Fastest Battle Plane

Army and navy pilots at San Diego, Cal., tested recently a new fighting airplane which attained a speed of 196 miles per hour at an altitude of 6000 feet. This is faster by about twenty-five miles per hour than any previous fighter. The new ship, known as the Boeing 100, is powered by a Wasp 425 horse-power engine. The additional speed is attained through cleaner design of the plane, installation of special Boeing cowl around the engine to streamline its cylinders, use of smaller wheels, an improved landing gear, propeller of a new design, an engine with a higher compression ratio (6-to-1) than used heretofore, and a supercharger which carries sea level atmospheric pressure to the engine at an altitude of 8000 feet. The special cowl alone adds ten miles per hour to the plane's speed, while the other factors make up the other fifteen miles.

COUNTRY TAKES AIR LEAD

Report Shows United States Now Has 30,000 Miles Flying Lanes; Germany Held Honors

Leading the world in aviation transportation with 30,000 miles of airways in operation throughout the country at the beginning of 1930, the United States now ranks above Germany, which is credited with approximately 30,000 miles.

With 4,000,000 miles of scheduled flying operations during a twelve months' period three years ago, figures mounted during the first six months of 1929 for forty-five air-transport companies to 8,000,000 miles, and it is expected that with the latter half of last year the total for 1929 will rise to more than 12,000,000 miles.

Based on data obtained from the Department of Commerce and representatives of the Texas Company from the various States and many foreign countries, these facts are contained in a report just completed by the Texaco travel service.

"Transport planes in this country are flying approximately 75,000 miles a day, the equivalent of three times around the world," the report continues. "There are more than 10,000 miles of illuminated airways here. Though being operated only over certain designated airways with scheduled stops at eighty-two cities, America's air-express service is available to all shippers.

"A flat fee of $5 is now charged per package for the express service between New York and Boston, Western Union messengers calling for the packages which are delivered four hours later. Present operations point to the adoption of this plan in most sections of the country. During the year the service between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts was so extended and perfected that it now is possible to ship a package in the morning in New York and have it delivered late the next afternoon on the Pacific Coast."

Equipped with refrigeration facilities, especially built planes today are being employed for the transportation of fish from the Gulf of Mexico cities to Midwest points, and from the seaboards into Mexico, according to the Texaco report.

"During the last three years American air lines transported 5,644,836 pounds of express," it is pointed out. "The air service is said to be three times as speedy as rail, and in many instances five times. However, the steamship and rail lines are by no means doomed. They will continue to function with definite missions, as will the airplanes."

AMONG THE FANS

In reporting the account of the Pasadena vs. Municipal Men's Club team match last week, Mr. C. N. Moulton should have been mentioned as captain of the Pasadena team.

Mr. Asa Long, who won the fifth and seventh American championship tournaments, was recently married at his home in Toledo, O.

Willie Ryan is spending a few weeks in Florida but writes the Checkergram will be published on scheduled time. On his way down he stopped off at Nashville, Tenn., and played a fourteen-game match with Edwin Hunt. Score, Ryan 1, Hunt 1, drawn 12.

Willie also writes that early in April he will play another match with Basil Case in Chicago and that in May he will "cross the pond" and play a match in London, Eng., with Leonard Claxton.

In recent State tournaments Guy Garwood won the championship of Ohio. Charles Munson of Kansas, and R. W. Clevenger of Oklahoma.

Mr. O. B. Stone, formerly of New York but who has spent the last three or four years in Arizona and California, has been quite sick at his present home in Pasadena.

Air passengers may carry thirty pounds of baggage without cost, it has been decided following tests by the American Air Transport Association in which it was found that the average air traveler carried twenty-eight pounds of clothing and other articles into a plane.

AIR MERGER GIVES CITY NEW SYSTEM

Consolidation of Two Companies Results in More Service

Consolidation of Aero Corporation of California with Western Air Express will make this city headquarters for the largest commercial air transport system in the United States in point of plane miles scheduled daily, figures compiled by the traffic departments of the two companies indicate.

By March 15 the merger will be completed, according to all reports. Terms of the consolidation of the two large aero companies require that 70 per cent of the stockholders of Aero Corporation approve the plan before March 15. It is stated that such approval is already been granted in effect.

Western Air Express, the pioneer air passenger company of America, now maintains a daily schedule of 8000 plane-miles a day. In addition, its affiliated companies, West Coast Air Transport and Midcontinent Air Express, have scheduled 2300 miles of flying every twenty-four hours. Adding Aero Corporation's daily total of 1600 miles, operated by its subsidiary company, Standard Airlines to El Paso from Los Angeles, the grand total is brought to 12,800 miles.

The parent company of this great group, Western Air Express, began operations April 16, 1926 when the first mail-laden ship with Air Mail Pilot Maury Graham at the controls left at 7:35 a.m. for Salt Lake City. At that time only five planes were owned and twenty persons employed. Now it has forty airplanes, counting its newest addition, the largest landplane in the world today, and 410 employees. Added to these figures are the planes and personnel of its affiliated companies.

Wheels Added to Navy Plane Landing Gears

SAN DIEGO, Feb. 1. (AP)—Navy fliers stached to the Pacific fleet are using a new combination type of combat airplane in their flights here.

The new pursuit ships can be catapulted from a battleship and come down on water, airplane carrier or earth with equal ease because the Corsair single-seater seaplanes have been equipped with wheels.

The gear consists of a pair of wheels that can be wound up for water landings. The wheels do not disappear in the shell of the pontoon, but assume a position about 45 degrees up from horizontal.

If, however, the pilot wishes to land ashore or on a carrier, he winds down the wheels, making it a land type plane. The additional gear does not interfere with a plane's efficiency or increase the wind resistance to any great degree, it is claimed.

Heretofore ships carried only seaplanes, which had to be catapulted into the air and land on the sea—a hazardous undertaking when weather is bad.

Visalia Plane Motor Tested

VISALIA, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The airplane motor designed and built in Visalia by Grover L. Weathers started off on the first spin and ran perfectly in its first test recently.

This motor is a six-cylinder radial, with potential horsepower of 15 to 165 with maximum revolutions per minute of about 2000. A unique feature is the four-valve system, two intake and two exhaust valves on each cylinder. The placement of the valves permits entry of the cool gas directly around the two hot exhaust valve sleeves, thus serving to cool the exhaust valves and warming the gas.

PLANE MAKERS RETRENCH

First Major Readjustment by Newest Industry Showing Success

Aircraft and engine production reports for 1929 made public by the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce indicate clearly that the aeronautical industry is successfully making its first major readjustments in the opinion of Frederick B. Rentschler, president of the chamber.

"Leaders in the aircraft industry realized that a condition of over-expansion and overproduction was certain to result if the production pace set during the first six months of 1929 was continued, and many of the most soundly managed units in the industry prepared for a major readjustment by cutting down their production schedules long before the general financial crisis was experienced in Wall street," Mr. Rentschler said today.

While the reports of ninety-six major aircraft manufacturers show 6034 airplanes produced during 1929, the six months figures of seventy-one manufacturers totaled 3381 planes. This production decline during the second six months indicates the wise policy established by many of the companies, which cut their schedules to meet the actual demands of the domestic market, and sought new fields for the distribution of their products abroad. The same general trend was current in engine manufacturing, where 3826 units were produced by fifteen companies during the first six months and 3852 by twenty-five manufacturers during the second six months.

There was a sharp rise in the number of airplanes shipped abroad during the second six months of 1929 to bring the total number of aircraft exported during the year to 341, with a valuation of $5,272,217. The export market in 1929 was more than three times that of 1928, when only 162 planes were shipped to other countries with a total valuation of $1,750,653.

The market for aircraft engines in foreign countries during 1929 was more than twice as large as in 1928. While only 179 engines valued at $684,826 were exported in 1928, the first eleven months of 1929 saw 902 units valued at $1,309,647 shipped outside the United States. The foreign market for aeronautical equipment also was doubled in 1929.

From the middle of the year on, production schedules were readjusted, so that by the end of the year the output of commercial airplanes and engines was relatively in line with the domestic demand, to which was being added an attractive export market.

Capital invested by the public flowed impartially into the manufacturing and operating branches of the industry. The manufacturers of military and commercial aircraft and the operators of air mail and passenger routes alike drew their capital from public sources. Military manufacturing and contract air mail proved the backbone of the industry—a condition which it was expected would be necessary for some time.

At the end of the year, the industry was contracting in some phases and expanding in others. Isolated capital was in some instances liquidating. Group capital was wisely economizing and boldly advancing, willing to risk a long period of attrition, providing it had definite assurance of public support for the transport lines, government backing for the contract air-mail system, and an assurance that the five-year military program would be carried out.

The Exposition Park Horseshoe Chess and Checker Club is located at 3990 Menlo street, a beautiful new community building of the City Playground Department, near Vermont and Santa Barbara streets. It is open every afternoon and evening, including Sundays and holidays. W. H. Bates, president of the club, says they have over 200 members and not a roughneck or agitator in the bunch. Dues of only $1 a year cover all activities. Members of other chess clubs are not asked to join but are welcome at any time as visitors. Chess players in that part of town should investigate. At present there are about twenty active chess players in the club. As soon as the number increases, and more interest is shown, the club will promote a tourney and put up a trophy for the winner. W. C. Pitchett, one of the strong chess and checker players of the downtown club, spends most of his afternoons at the Exposition club, balancing up his amusements with pitching horseshoes, which he says works up a good appetite. The club also holds dances frequently.

Our former local champ, Donald Mugridge, is still a post-grad at Harvard, and has been playing top board for his college team in the Boston league. The following league game shows him pitted against the famous Franklin K. Young, writer of many well-known chess books.

The Pasadena Chess Club has started its major championship tourney. First round results: Caukins lost to Prof. Bateman; Simpson lost to Heath; Houghton lost to La Plante; Bullinger lost to Taylor; Broughton lost to Unthank; Cave won from Jamesen; Moss lost to Jackson. (First named player had whites.) The Pasadena club still meets Monday and Friday nights in their new location, 397½ East Colorado street, the Gold Room of the Maryland Hotel. They hope to have space soon for day chess.

The rival cities of the Riviera, Nice in France, and San Remo on the Italian side are the Meccas of the chess world this month. An international journey of twelve players starts February 15 at Nice, with Dr. Alexander, Grunfeld and Tartakower, Marovic, Colle and Scotch among the outsiders to compete. Between the closing of the first of the journey the 4th Jan. and the start of the Nice tourney a "Chess Derby" will be held at the Nice club with visiting masters playing all comers.

When Harry Borochow, former local champ, loses a game in a major event, the fans wonder how A. H. Bierwirth, genial expert of the club in the Union League Building, pulled his favorite crang-outang opening against Borochow in their game last week in the club's 1930 major championship tourney. Black worked up a big advantage on the queenside, while underestimating white's kingside maneuvers. Black's sacrifice on move 24 was unsound due to overlooking white's rejoinder on move 27 in conjunction with his 26.

In the big tourney at San Remo, World's Champion Alekhine started off with five straight wins, then in the sixth round was held to a draw by Spielmann in a twenty-move game. Last reports show him with a firm hold on first place. Bernhauer crept up near the top after two early losses, one to Colle, Belgian champion, and the other to Monticelli, who has resigned the Italian championship.

George Patterson of Hollywood, 1929 local champ, cinched the 1930 championship when he won last week's game with Borochow in the local club's major tourney. With one game left to play Pat's score is 11-2. Borochow lost twice last week, to Bierwirth and Patterson, but holds second place, 9-4. Although Scholtz lost an adjourned game with Gibbs the popular Doc holds third place, 8-4. Gibbs is fourth, 6-5, followed by Bierwirth, 7-6.

LINDBERGH'S SUGGESTION WORKED OUT

Remark Made by Famed Flyer Results in Aid to Aviation

One of the newest developments in aviation lighting can be traced directly to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh. Overhearing a remark made by "Lindy," when he visited the General Electric Company's research laboratory last summer, that to him "flashings made by the glare of trolley cars are noticeable when flying in a dense fog, even though other lights are not distinguishable," Dr. Irving Langmuir, assistant director of the laboratory, set about experimenting with apparatus which would produce such a flash.

Experiments resulted in the building of an electric flasher, of a new type. Flashing of code signals, the light will guard aviators against the possible error they might make in mistaking a trolley flash for a beacon, and by a definite plan of airport signals, will inform the pilot of his exact location.

Though the light is still in an experimental stage, satisfactory tests have been made at the General Electric Laboratory and at the Schenectady airport, where one has been in operation for almost a year. While a high degree of visibility has been generally reported, a definite case of its satisfactory performance is on record at the airport. One night in foggy weather, an aviator was traveling toward Schenectady at an altitude following the New York Central tracks. While at a distance of about four miles from the airport, he picked up the flashing light beacon, until then shielded from his view by hills, and followed it to the flying field. He reported that due to the nature of the light and the frequent flashes, the beacon was easy to pick up and follow.

It is considered probable, according to engineers of the General Electric aeronautics department that in the future the main airway beacon will include incandescent neon and flashing are lamps. During good weather, which generally prevails, only the incandescent beacon will be necessary, the other two being held in reserve for unfavorable weather. Each type of light will have its special use, and the are as the source of power in severe flying weather.

Giant Fokker Equipped With New Absorber

The F-32, giant Fokker [illegible] two-passenger cabin plane [illegible] at Western Air Express Field today to be used on the daylight run to Kansas City, will land on the Los Angeles-built shock absorber, the largest oleopneumatic shock absorbers ever constructed. These units, engineered by the Oleo Spring Company, represent the most efficiency per pound weight ever built to carry a maximum load.

Each shock absorber, which weighs only fifty-five pounds, will stand a landing impact of 178 miles per hour of energy without rebound. The shock struts themselves are seven inches in diameter by three feet six inches in length and have an eleven-inch shock stroke.

The Oleo Air Spring Company, which has been manufacturing shock absorbers for eighteen years at San Francisco, recently moved to Los Angeles because of the greater manufacturing facilities and possibilities here.

Radio Network Will Guide Navy Planes

Final construction plans for the international aircraft radio network of seventeen main stations and sixteen countries for the protection and guidance of passenger and mail transport planes flying between New York and Buenos Aires have been completed.

The installation orders went out upon detailed reports of the company's radio engineers, who during the last seven months have conducted exhaustive experiments with various types of low-wave transmitting and receiving sets under all manner of climate and geography conditions affecting radio communications through the wide variety of the line. Tests of the present equipment have successfully overcome the unusual static conditions within the West Indies and consistent transmission over the vast flat lands of Brazil and Argentina and through the rapidly changing atmospheric conditions encountered on the company's transcontinental route over the four-mile-high Andes into Chile.

ROAD BUDGET SET

The budget of the County highway department calls for expenditure of $13,500,000 in [illegible] road building and maintenance.

HIGHWAYS IN MEXICO NEED

Editorial Excursionists Make Report

Increase in Mileage Means More Car Sales

Building of Roads Stopped by Last Revolt

A good highway down the west coast of Mexico starting at Nogales would aid materially in the future prosperity of that section of the country, according to various members of the California Editorial Association who have just returned from a tour of the southern republic, extending south to Mexico City. Although this section is served by the Southern Pacific Railway of Mexico, highway transportation in Mexico of the west coast is not well developed, and affords too little opportunity to the farmers and manufacturers to market their products to the markets.

AMERICAN CARS USED

Automobiles manufactured in the United States are being used in increasing numbers in the southern states, it was noted by the editors. Since the rapid increase in the use of motor cars has developed, the need for good highways has been felt more keenly and efforts are being made by forward-looking Mexicans to build a modern highway from Nogales to the border. Such a road would open four States of the west coast to what would join a modern highway that is now being constructed by the Mexican government from Guadalajara to Mexico City.

The advantages of such a highway through this section to residents of the United States would be the following possibilities. Charming Mexican cities would be found at less than a day's run apart, and would afford tourists from this section an opportunity of driving through this picturesque and romantic land in comfort.

The last section of the road from Nogales to Guaymas is in the State of Sonora, and would have been completed before now had it not been for the last revolution. Promises of officers of Sonora told the editorial visitors that just as soon as money could be made available construction on this road would be resumed.

WORK WOULD FOLLOW

It is believed that if a start is actually made in Sonora the States of Nayarit and Jalisco also will improve a highway construction program which would ultimately connect the west coast road at Guadalajara, second largest city in Mexico, where it would connect with the good roads leading to the interior of the central part of the republic.

The Automobile Club of Southern California has pointed out to the Mexican governments that a good road through these west coast states of Mexico would attract thousands of motor tourists from the country who would patronize hotels, tourist camps, curio stores and restaurants, providing a steady flow of money into the territory traversed by the proposed highway.

SIGNS BEING INSTALLED

Signs are being installed on United States Highway 99 for a distance of four miles entering Stockton, closing one-half of the road, and making careful driving necessary, states the touring bureau of the Automobile Club of Southern California.

CONSTRUCTION IN PROGRESS

Construction is in progress for a distance of two miles just south of Palo Alto on the Palo-Lilac Road, which makes careful driving, particularly in wet weather, necessary.

Higher Speed Adds to Work of Auto Tires

"The rubber tire on which the car rests is as much a fundamental and vital portion of the transmission mechanism of the car as is the clutch, transmission gears or the axle. Every ounce of power that is developed by the engine must be passed through the fabric structure of the tires before the power can move the car a single inch."

This statement was made recently before the Chicago section of the Society of Automotive Engineers by R. D. Shields, of the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company. He mentioned that within the last year many more complaints have been made regarding rapid tread-wear than in all the history of tire manufacturers. But, when the conditions that give rise to the complaints are analysed, the reason for them can easily be seen; the answer is comprised in two words, "increased power."

When the design engineer starts to bring out a new car model, he provides for a larger engine; then he must have a larger clutch, put in stronger gears and probably increase the size of the axle somewhat. But when it comes to equipping the car with tires, even smaller tires may be fitted. We all subconsciously recognize that the faster a car goes, the harder work is required of the engine and transmission gears, but we forget the tires. If the speed of a car is doubled, only one-quarter the tire mileage should be expected, according to Mr. Shields, for the work the tire does is inversely proportional to the square of the speed. When more powerful engines are used and the acceleration and normal speed of the car are increased, followed with more effective brakes and more frequent traffic stops, it is not a cause for wonder that tread-wear is rapid.

Another factor has been the reduction in wheel diameter; every inch taken from the diameter takes 10 per cent from the life of the tire.

Women From All South in Economy Run

Entries in the Gilmore Wrightwood mountain second annual economy run for women drivers have been made from all over Southern California.

If it were possible to take off the limit on the number of entries for the women drivers' economy run there would have been 180 women competing, according to Herman Alber, manager of the event for the Gilmore Oil Company. Accommodation limits make it necessary to limit the entries to the maximum of forty-two.

This is strictly a stock car event, under the official sanction of the American Automobile Association, and run off under the official supervision of A. C. Pillsbury and George F. Stephenson, representatives of that association for this district. Every entry must measure up to stock requirements, and must be a current model automobile of 1929 or 1930 production.

The run this year has been increased to 200 miles, thirty miles longer than last year, to give a better average basis of comparison of economy.

The run takes the car through all driving conditions, including city traffic, winding boulevards, country roads, and steep, but safe mountain grades.

The run starts at 7:30 a.m. February 14, from Twenty-eighth and Santa Fe avenue. Each contestant is allowed ten hours in which to complete the 200-mile run to the finish at Wrightwood Mountains, a mile above sea level. The officials will complete their computations, and announce the winner the following morning, when the trophies will be awarded.

AXLELESS CAR COMING

A "one wheel" or "axleless" car is soon to go into production, according to O. F. Lundelius, the inventor. The car has been on the drawing board more than four years and has attracted the attention of leading motor-car manufacturers, some of whom have had the product under test.

HANDLING INNOVATIONS

The car embodies some startling innovations, but is as conventional in appearance as any of the automobiles of standard design. The engine, with the exception of the fact that it is carried upon eight transverse springs, four of which extend from each wheel in front and one number in the rear, is conventional. The cars were built in Los Angeles, some of which have been in use for a period of years. In addition to the unique spring suspension, the car is equipped with a steering mechanism that eliminates caster in front wheels common with the introduction of balloon tires. It is claimed by the inventor that the product yields long-life, approximately 100 per cent increase in tire mileage and greater safety. Ease of handling, absence of skidding on turns at high speeds and roadability are other features.

PLAN EIGHT-CYLINDER MODEL

It is stated that a number of models will be placed on the market ranging in price from $1095 to $2295, all of which will be powered by eight-cylinder motors.

The car is equipped with Warner electric four-wheel brakes, which will be standard equipment on the production models, it is reported.

The development of this independently sprung wheel design has been made both for adaptation to rear-wheel driven vehicles and for front wheel drives.

The design reduces the unsprung weight to its minimum—the four wheels which ride on the ground. These being independent, make the proportion of blow from unsprung weight when it hits an obstruction to the weight resting on the spring above it too small to affect it, and in the majority of cases too small to even have it felt by the passengers. If passengers do not receive the shock neither does the mechanism on which they rest.

NEW PLANE MOTOR READY

Following a series of tests, a 190-horsepower Kinner airplane motor is ready for production. Official announcement of the new motor was issued by the Kinner Airplane and Motor Corporation, following the tests.

The present Kinner 100-horsepower model, which the company will continue to manufacture, the new 190-horsepower model is a five-cylinder radial air-cooled motor. It is rated at 190 horsepower at 1,900 r.p.m., and in tests it was subjected to twenty runs at full throttle.

The new motor has a bore of 5½ inches and a stroke of 5½ inches, with a total piston displacement of 710 cubic inches. The compression ratio is 5.0 to 1. It weighs 500 pounds.

Simulating the United States Department of Commerce test, upon the results of which an approved type certificate is issued, the motor was run continuously for more than fifty hours on the company's testing equipment. So successful was this lengthy run that executives of the company made immediate application for the official government test.

One of the outstanding features of the 190-horsepower model is the absence of vibration and excessive noise. Aeronautical engineers were of the opinion that the minimum number of cylinders required to assure smoothness in operation was seven. The successful production of the Kinner five-cylinder 100-horsepower model several years ago, and its tremendous popularity since, have completely reversed this idea.

MAINTENANCE CREW PLACED ON PASS

The California Highway Commission has placed a road maintenance crew on Westgard Pass between Big Pine and Tonopah to give assistance during storm conditions.

OILED GRAVEL PREVAILS

From Reeds Station on United States Highway 99 to Maricopa and Taft, oiled gravel and pavement now prevail the entire distance, states the touring bureau of the Automobile Club of Southern California.

CHAINS NECESSARY

Prevailing weather conditions throughout Southern California have again emphasized the necessity of all motorists carrying chains in their cars for emergency use when leaving the main traveled highways, according to advice of the touring bureau of the Automobile Club of Southern California.

DETOUR MUDDY

Construction is in progress on the Hemet-Idyllwild Road between the Ranger Station and the north fork of the San Jacinto River and the detour in use is rather muddy in wet weather making chains necessary.

AUTOMOBILE HISTORY TRACED

BY DAVID J. WILKIE

DETROIT, Feb. 1. (AP)—One of the biggest factors in automobile production probably is the "conveyor system," a device that the automotive industry itself brought into existence.

When the system first was inaugurated in automobile factories it brought the criticism that efforts were being made to "drive" the workers, forcing them to keep up with the conveyors.

In favor of the conveyors, however, it was pointed out that they insured an even output, and that one lazy unit could not hold up the entire line of production.

The conveyors, some of them broad belts that carry small parts and some of them massive chain devices that move the completed chassis assembly along the line until it has become a finished automobile, ready to operate under its own power, carry the materials and parts from place to place within the automobile factory.

Workers, instead of moving from one place to another in the factory, with finished cars or cars in various stages of completion standing at different points in the plant, now stand still at their work. Consecutive perations are placed adjacent to one another so that each succeeding operation is passed on to the next with a minimum of handling.

The conveyor system has been most highly developed in the plants devoted to quantity production. This is especially true in the Ford plants. Here everything possible is produced mechanically.

One of the interesting accomplishments in the Ford plant is the conversion of raw materials into cash in approximately fifty hours, and of this fifty hours, about twenty-four are consumed in shipping and handling.

Coppers Pay for New Truck

PHOENIX, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—A new standard of valuation for motor cars was set here when a local news agent loaded $2,300 pennies, weighing about a third of a ton, into a small commercial truck, to pay for the truck itself. The sum had been accumulating in the news stand since it was started in 1921. Being a cash transaction, there was no charge added for the task of counting the copper cargo.

MANY TINY FISH TO BE PLANTED

Southern California to be Anglers' Paradise

Millions of Trout Placed in Many Streams

Fish and Game Commission Plan Announced

BY CHARLES C. COHAN

Southern California will be made an incomparable fisherman's paradise. Its streams and waterways to be stocked with teeming millions of trout and bass will add luster to its already world-renowned fame for deep-sea fishing.

This is forecast by a fish-propagation and distribution program contemplated for this year and back of which is George B. Clarkson, Southern California's representative on the State Fish and Game Commission. It will supplement the extensive game and game-bird rearing and distribution activites he has already sponsored.

WIDE DISTRIBUTION

More than 2,380,000 trout of catchable size, chiefly the rainbow, easter nbrook and black-spotted varieties, obtained fro mlocally hatched eggs, will be placed this year in every feasible water course in Southern California.

Many thousands of striped bass, which recent experimenis have proved can flourish in the Salton Sea, will be placed there to make that Imperial Valley salt-water lake, a magnet for fishermen. Other suitable waters also will be similarly stocked.

This utilization of striped bass is of one of the most interesting chapters in California fish and game history and will be dealt with in more detail hereinafter.

An idea of the economic importance of these activities may be had when it is recalled that Southern California pays 46 1-2 per cent of the State's fish and game revenue that totals more than $1,500,000 annually, and it is estimated that fishing and hunting licenses, fines and other revenues and sportsmen's expenditures for equipment and travel segregate $71,000,000 or more in California every year. This is a direct gift to the taxpayers of the State by the sportsmen.

PROGRAM DETAILS

Contingent on financial allocation, it is proposed to increase the number of Southern California fish hatcheries with a new one at the mouth of the Santa Ana River in San Bernardino county having a guaranteed flow of 1200 miner inches daily. This will increase materially the trout fry for Southern California streams.

Bartlett Lake, two and a half miles from Big Bear Lake and 2400 feet higher in elevation, has been obtained as a rearing pond from its owner whose name it bears, by Ralph Williams as representative of the Isaac Walton League and the sportsmen of the Big Bear Valley district. These interested parties will pay one-half the maintenance costs and the Fish and Game Commission will pay the rest. Black-spotted trout fry obtained from local hatcheries will be reared there and when of adult size will be liberated in suitable streams of that region. The two hatcheries at Big Bear can hatch from 2,000,000 to 4,000,000 eggs when conditions are favorable.

The San Gabriel Canyon hatchery now has about 750,000 four and six-inch eastern brook and rainbow trout. There is a similar place at Forsey Creek. Fish from these hatcheries and elsewhere are placed in temporary hatcheries in conjunction with rearing ponds at Snow Creek, eight miles from Banning, and also in another battery of rearing ponds below the hatchery site in the San Gabriel Canyon.

Many big-mouth bass already have been taken from Los Angeles reservoirs and suitably planted where their best growth is assured.

STRIPED BASS PLANTING

The further introduction of striped bass into Southern California this year is an outstanding feature of the program. These fish, brought from the northern part of the State to which they originally were transplanted from the Atlantic Coast, cannot be artificially propagated, but must be taken from their customary haunts. It is through the fish rescue division of the Fish and Game Commission that these fish are obtained for Southern California waters. After a close survey, George Neale, head of this division, found where these fish could best be obtained. It is the division's business to rescue fish left by receding water in streams and other waterways and although in existence for little more than the last year, it has rescued almost 4,000,000 fish that would have perished.

Canals of the West Side irrigation district in the vicinity of Tracy in San Joaquin county were chosen as the places from which to obtain striped bass which are found there in abundance at the proper size, about five inches long. Consignments to the Salton Sea are conveyed in specially prepared cars.

Members of Imperial Valley sportsmen's organizations and the El Centro Chamber of Commerce have given much aid in planting these fish.

At first, the bass were placed in water too shallow to afford them adequate protection from pelicans, but the experience gained in this connection assures the proper locale in future for planting these game fish.

BASS FIGHT GAMELY

The striped bass, which bids fair to attain a new fame in Southern California, commends itself highly to the fisherman. It is a game fighter and as it can attain considerable weight, it gives the fisherman who hooks one plenty of sport. Many are caught that weigh twelve pounds and some specimens run as high as fifty and eighty pounds in weight.

This species of base was first introduced into California under State auspices in 1879 when about 150 of them were placed in the Carquinez Straits near Martinez. Subsequently, others, were distributed elsewhere throughout the central and northern parts of the State in streams flowing into he ocean, for these bass like the salt sea and come up the streams to spawn. Statistical records from the commercial fishery bureau of the Fish and Game Division show that in 1928, 484,113 pounds of these bass were taken by commercial fishermen, mostly in Alameda and Contra Costa counties, where this species was planted originally.

State Provides for Increased Fish Supply

JACK RABBIT HUNTING GOOD AT LANCASTER

Local shotgun devotees who feel that they didn't get enough action during the dove, duck and quail seasons, now closed, can unloose their pieces up around Lancaster and get in some pretty fair jack-rabbit hunting, it was reported by Harry Hoyt, shooting authority at the William H. Hoegee Company. The season on cottontails is closed in this particular section, but is open the year around in San Diego and Imperial counties.

Lancaster is about eighty miles north of Los Angeles, reached over a good road and the information reaching Hoegee's stated that there were hundreds of jack rabbits in the locality.

Earl Wilcox of the Western Auto Supply is in receipt of word from Rainbow Gibson at Weasku Inn, near Grants Pass, Or., telling of wonderful silverside salmon fishing. Gibson's report said that some really big salmon were being taken out, that the weather was cold, but not too cold to enjoy the fishing.

Steelhead trout fishing in the tidewaters of certain rivers in Southern California has been attracting quite a number of anglers the last week. The bar at the mouth of the Santa Ynez River has been washed out and some pretty good fishing has been had, a number of fish weighing as much as eight pounds being taken out.

At the mouth of the Santa Clara River, Archie Aldrich of Hoegee's declares that steelhead fishing has been good, but that at the mouth of the Ventura, it has been poor due to oil conditions. No improvement is expected this season.

Of the three rivers, the mouth of the Santa Clara seems the best bet. The fish, according to Aldrich, apparently have been unable to get up the river and have concentrated in large numbers in a lagoon, a part of the river's mouth. To reach this point it is advised to go by way of Pierpont Inn and drive south down the beach on the new concrete beach road to the end of this road and park on the cement. A walk then, of about one-eighth mile, will bring an angler to the lagoon.

The steelhead caught so far have been taken on nickel-plated spinners and have weighed from five to seven pounds. Either a casting or a fly rod can be used to good advantage. Fishing from shore with spawn or wading out has been bringing good results.

Fred Klein reports that surf fishing has picked up considerably during the last week. Many perch have been caught along the local coast running from three to four pounds. Sheephead are being caught in deep water off rocks, clams being the best bait.

There has been considerable activity at both Wilmington and at the San Pedro boat works the last few weeks, where many of the fishing boats and quite a few of the barges are undergoing overhauling, repainting and refitting in preparation for the spring fishing. The old-time salts are predicting early runs of barracuda this year, some looking for a run early next month.

WATERSHED PROTECTION IN SOUTH CITED AS NEED

BY GEORGE P. CLEMENTS

Mother Nature gave Southern California everything necessary to human happiness but left it to human ingenuity and intelligence to assemble these ingredients. Our natural gifts are bountiful—climates without measure, soils beyond the dreams of avarice, and a topography of natural beauty and adaptable to wide economic use.

In only one factor did nature stint us—water—and that factor is the crux of the whole. While Southern California has 20 per cent of the land area of the State, she has but one-twentieth of the sustaining waters of the State, and these sustaining waters are totally dependent upon an annual rain, a rain crop so varying and vacillating as to require, according to investigators, forty years upon which to compute an average. To make this mean a permanent source of supply, there are two things necessary—a well-clothed watershed to create a sponge, and a well-filled underground reservoir supply to be drawn upon during drought years.

While there was always a bountiful winter runoff, there was a limit to the amount of summer waters and when this was reached, the ingenuity of the settler led him to the great underground reservoirs hidden beneath the soil, through the use of wells.

Many early wells were originally truly artesian, but as more land was occupied and a greater draft on the water was made they became pumping propositions, and finally the draft became so great as to exclude the possibility of the normal refilling through the filtering of seasonal rainwater. This called for deepening of wells and greater lifts.

Southern California's advertisement to the world as a winter summer resort has brought an increasing number of tourist people who accepted the urge of the out-of-doors. The mountain areas immediately assumed a recreational value. The direct result of this was an increased threat against water conservation in the major watersheds of the south. Fires have become increasingly destructive from year to year, until it may be stated that these splendid natural sponges have been reduced in their efficiency to at least 50 per cent.

The denuding of the hills has brought with it another serious menace—that of erosion and flood during winter rainfalls, making forestation more arduous and in many cases impossible. At the same time it has caused millions of dollars of damage annually to the occupied lands below.

The natural sequence of these annual debacles was the inauguration of flood-control measures. But engineers are fully cognizant that unless further denudation of the hills and mountains be checked and a comprehensive program of reforestation inaugurated flood-control measures will be of only short life in their offered protection, since erosion due to the destruction of the ground cover will fill the reservoirs with detritus.

Regardless of flood-control measures evolution from open land to cement-closed cities has depreciated underground water reservoirs of replenishment and has increased flood menace. A greater draft is daily being made upon residual waters through new wells and deepening of falling wells. Dams high up in the mountains will unquestionably bring about some changes in underground water reservoirs. These conditions are obvious, and every endeavor should be made to increase the efficiency of watershed areas through the reduction of fire hazards and the reclothing of the hills.

ROAD REMAINS CLOSED

The road between Bishop and Mono Lake is still closed beyond Tom's Place on Rock Creek and will undoubtedly not open until weather conditions improve, according to the touring bureau of the Automobile Club of Southern California.

ROAD SURFACES SCRAPED

Work has started scraping all of the unpaved streets within the corporate limits of Tulare. According to George D. Spicer, superintendent of public works, recent rains have placed dirt streets in condition for the annual improvement.

HEADQUARTERS ESTABLISHED

Permanent distribution and service headquarters for LeBlond Aircraft motors have been established in the hangar of the Angelus Aero Corporation located at the Los Angeles Metropolitan Airport by C. C. Ludlow, Pacific Coast distributor.

COURT RULINGS HELP AUTOISTS

Legal Decisions Find in Favor of Motorists

Four court decisions of general interest to motorists throughout the country were rendered during January.

Three decisions in effect support the motorist's contention that he is not always in the wrong, while the fourth emphasizes the previous position of practically all courts that the rights of a pedestrian at a crosswalk are paramount.

PEDESTRIAN'S DUTIES

Of the three decisions upholding the rights of the motorists the most important is that of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, holding that while pedestrians may not be guilty of negligence, as a matter of law, in crossing a street between regular crossings, a pedestrian under such circumstances must be charged with a high duty of care to observe the approaching traffic on the street. The court followed an earlier Pennsylvania holding that "where one attempts to cross the street between crossings when vehicles are rapidly approaching close by, and injury results, he must be charged with such carelessness as to prevent a recovery." The court reversed a lower court's decision and instructed a verdict for the motorist.

GONGS MUST RING

The second decision, rendered by the United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, is to the effect that a motorist has a right to rely on the silence of a warning gong at a railway crossing, and cannot be charged with negligence if he drives upon the track after having stopped, looked and listened, and is then struck by a train. Failure of the gong to ring was sufficient assurance of safety to the motorist, the court declared in reversing the decision.

The lower court, in finding for the railway company, had followed the so called Goodman (Ohio) case in the United States Supreme Court which in effect places the entire burden of safely crossing a railroad track on the motorist, "even," said the Supreme Court, "to the extent, if necessary, of getting out of his automobile and walking onto the track to see if a train is approaching, if he cannot see otherwise."

The Fifth Circuit Court, however, declared the facts different because in the Goodman case there was no gong or warning of any kind, while in the case before it, the court pointed out, there had been a warning gong, but it was out of repair, thus in effect shifting the responsibility under such circumstances from the motorist to the railroad.

OILING IN PROGRESS

Oiling operations are now in progress on the Palm Springs-Indio Road for a distance of four miles from a point two miles south of the springs, and extreme care should be used in driving that section, states the touring bureau of the Automobile Club of Southern California.

ANOTHER HACK WILSON? - By Feg Murray

DANNY TAYLOR, who looks something like the pugnacious Hack Wilson, will get another tryout with the Cubs this spring, which may or may not mean something to you, dear reader, but is very important to Danny himself, and may prove to be very important to the Cubs. Danny (who is not to be confused with "Dummy" Taylor, famous (did-timer) was purchased from Memphis a year ago by the Wrigleyites, but didn't last long in the Windy City, being shipped soon to Reading of the International League—where he made an enviable record as an outfielder and slugger.

In 125 games for the Keys, Taylor batted .371, leading the league in that respect. He scored 113 runs, made 158 hits for a total base mark of 264, and gathered thirty-four doubles, nine triples and eighteen homers. He was walked seventy-eight times, struck out forty-seven, stole thirty-six bases and batted in ninety runs. In a league which included such famous former major-leaguers as Tris Speaker, Billy Southworth, Whitey Witt and Wally Pipp, Danny swung such a lively bat that no other regular came within twenty points of him.

It might be observed in passing that one Joe Rabbit of Toronto was the leading base stealer in the In-

TITLE MALLET CLASH ON TAP

Argentines Play San Carlos at Midwick Field

Championship Polo Tourney Continued Here Today

South Americans Favored in Second Game of Series

BY FRANK ROCHE

Capt. Manuel Andrada, burly South American polo ace, and his mad riding team-mates from the plains of Argentina make their first active bid for the Pacific Coast open championship, this afternoon when they cross mallets with a crack Rancho San Carlos four at the Midwick Country Club field. Today's mallet classic which is expected to draw a record crowd to Midwick, brings together two teams that simply bubble over with players of international caliber. The Four Horsemen of the Pampas rate at twenty-four goals, while the Rancho riders enjoy a twenty-two rating under United States Polo Association rules. Argentine because of its two-goal advantage will ride on the field favorite to collect the honors. The game which gets under way at 2:30 will be played on the flat as no handicaps are allowed in the tournament.

MANUEL ANDRADA

The Pampas riders — Andrada, Juan Reynal, Jose Reynal and Alfredo Harrington—introduced themselves to Southland fans a little more than a week ago in a dashing manner by taking two games from Midwick teams in special matches. The Argentines with their colorful riding and brilliant playing have won a place in the hearts of local fans and they are being highly touted to gallop off with the Coast championship series.

STIFF TEST

Today, however, the South Americans will get the stiffest kind of a test. On the Rancho team that will perform at Midwick are three internationalists who rate with the greatest players of that stripe in polo. They are E. A. S. Hopping, Alden Roark and Capt. Forrester. The fourth member of the team is George Gordon Moore, an up and coming low-goal player.

Hopping is an eight-goal man. He played with the American Big Four in 1926 in the international championships with South America. Hopping took Malcolm Stevenson's place on the United States squad at a time when the series was in the balance. His playing at No. 2 was largely responsible for the United States winning out, polo history tells us.

Alden Roark is a young Irishman, brother of the famous Pat Roark of British international polo. Alden was the sensation of the Southern California high-goal season at Midwick last year. His playing was so brilliant that he stole a good deal of the thunder of the in-

Rozelle Gets Job as Tiger Frosh Coach

Announcement was made by Graduate Manager Phil Ellsworth of Occidental College, yesterday of the appointment of Glenn Roselle, Tiger star of the gridiron and diamond for the past three years, as frosh baseball coach. This appointment was made in line with the general policy of the Occidental Board of Athletic Control to hire as frosh mentors those Oxy alumni who have recently been graduated. Along with this word came the further announcement that Patterson Field is to be turfed for use next fall during football practice, and that another practice football field will be turfed and ready for scrimmages by the opening of the grid season.

HURRICANE FOUR WINS POLO CLASH

Midwick Riders Beaten in Mallet Thriller by 9-to-8 Margin

Gerald Balding, handsome English polo ace, smashed through a mad group of men and horses yesterday at the Midwick Country Club field to score a goal which gave Laddie Sanford's Hurricane mallet swingers a 9-to-8 victory over Midwick's big four. Balding's goal, made in the eighth and final chukker of the game, came just twenty-five seconds before the bell, at a time when the two teams were tied, 8 to 8. The game, a special match affair, has no bearing on the Pacific Coast open championship play.

LADDIE SANFORD

It was nevertheless one of the hardest fought of the winter season. The tide swung from one side to the other with first one team taking the lead by one goal and then the other. Midwick did suffer a number of bad breaks in the seventh chukker, when on five different occasions they missed scoring by an eyelash. Two of Long-Legged Elmer Boeseke's shots hit the posts and bounced back to be swept up the field by Hurricane riders, who hawked the ball in great fashion throughout the afternoon.

Despite the terrific riding the game was only marred by one fall. That occurred in the sixth chukker when Eric Pedley was tossed from CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—University of Iowa, suspended from the Western Conference last May for subsidizing and proselyting athletes, today was reinstated at a special meeting of the faculty committee of the association at the University Club. The reinstatement is effective at once.

Action of the faculty committee, which was unanimous, came after the report of the eligibility committee had been read. This committee, composed of Prof. Thomas F. French of Ohio State; A. C. RESOLUTION UNANIMOUS

The following resolution was passed unanimously:

"Whereas, the conference is satisfied that the athletic authorities at Iowa have re-established the principle of faculty control and are earnestly endeavoring to correct the conditions which led to the suspension of athletic relations and whereas although there is reason to suspect that certain forces outside the administration are still resorting to improper methods of aiding athletes, the conference has confidence in the ability and determination of the Iowa authorities to ascertain the facts and to deal effectively with such abuses as may be found to exist;

"Therefore, be it resolved that athletic relations with Iowa be resumed, effective at once."

The following supplementary resolution was passed unanimously:

"It was moved, seconded and carried that it is the sense of this meeting that Iowa authorities be informed that it would be inadvisable to apply for the reinstatement to eligibility of those athletes disqualified on December 11, 1929."

As a result of this favorable action, Iowa may now schedule con-

FOUR BOYS TO RECEIVE TRIP

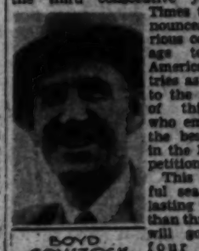
Southern California Winners Will be Rewarded

Program for 1930 Games is Announced by "Times"

Baker Only Star of Last Year Now Eligible

BY BRAVEN DYER

Sponsoring the Junior Olympic Games in Southern California for the third consecutive year, The Times today announces a glorious ocean voyage to Latin-American countries as a reward to the four boys of this region who emerge with the best records in the 1930 competition.



BOYD COMSTOCK

This wonderful sea journey, lasting more than three weeks, will go to the four Southern California youngsters who are crowned champions in the annual Southern California finals to be held here during the early part of June. The trip will be made in July and will follow immediately after the jaunt to Atlantic City for the national finals.

Last year more than 25 000 youngsters competed in the Southern California Junior Olympic Games program. The four winners went to Atlantic City for the nationals and then, following their return to Los Angeles, enjoyed the experience of a wonderful ocean voyage to the Hawaiian Islands.

EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY

In announcing the boat cruise award from New York to Los Angeles through the Panama Canal The Times is placing before the youth of Southern California the opportunity of winning an educational tour, the like of which has seldom been offered.

W. A. Young, Jr., passenger traffic manager of the Panama Mail Steamship Company, over whose line the voyage will be made, is arranging details of the trip which will take the four lucky winners into seven Latin-American countries. Expenses of the entire journey from Los Angeles to New York and through the Canal back to this city will be borne by this newspaper, the trip not costing Southern California's champions a dime.

Mr. Young, in commenting on the sea voyage describes it in this manner:

"A Panama Mail cruise that will permit the four winners to see two ports in Colombia, South America; a two days' visit in the Panama Canal Zone, and, of course, the wonderful trip through the Canal itself; a day's visit in Corinto, Nicaragua, a day in El Salvador with a trip to the capital city, San Salvador; a day's visit

STOVER LEADING DOG RACE

Idaho Musher Increases Edge in Second Annual Sierra Derby

BY RALPH HUSTON

"Times" Staff Representative

TAHOE TAVERN, Feb. 1.—Running his dogs at the same steady pace that he used in the opening dash yesterday, Roy Stover of McCall, Idaho, driving for the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce, increased his lead in the second annual Sierra dog derby here today.

Stover's conglomerate team covered the thirty miles to Truckee and back in 2:29:51 for a total of 5:00:56 for the two days.

Delbert Groom, the 17-year-old musher from Rigby, Idaho, again furnished the thrills in the snow classic, and kept his hold on second place, just ten minutes behind Stover. Groom ran into trouble on the downhill run to Truckee, and his elapsed time was fourth best. But on the upgrade he raced back in the sensational time of one hour and twenty-one minutes—the best ever recorded for the course—to finish in 2:34:38 for a two-day total of 5:10:38.

Earl Kimball, of Cascade, Idaho, running in Reno colors, moved from fourth to third in total time, when he dashed home in third place today. Kimball is driving for Mrs. Stonebaker, and has the most beautiful dog in the race in Ring, his Irish setter lead dog. Kimball went down in 1:03:50 for the best time of the day, but shortly after he started on the return trip, one of his dogs gave out, and had to be carried back in the sled.

Tud Kent of Ashton, Idaho jumped from sixth place to fourth today with a total elapsed time of 5:31:31. Kent had a lot of trouble today, and it was only a great performance on the return that gave him his good time. Just after the start, his lead dog bolted for the kennels, and it was several minutes before he could untangle his traces.

During the fifteen-minute intermission at Truckee, he put a new leader in front, and it took the dog a couple of miles to get acclimated to his new duties.

INTERSECTIONAL GAMES WILL NOT BE DROPPED

BY RUSSELL J. NEWLAND

Associated Press Sports Writer

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 1. (AP)—Football fans who enjoy their intersectional games either during the regular season or as a post-season affair need have no worries that this type of game will be discontinued by members of the Pacific Coast Conference. This information, interesting to several hundred thousand persons in the far west, came out of the private meeting held here today by most of the presidents of the colleges and universities that mage up the conference.

DR R.B VON KLEINSMID

While declining to divulge what subjects had been taken up in the morning session, M. Lyle Spencer, president of the University of Washington, gave out the information that the faculty heads had no intention of discussing the intersectional game subject with a view toward its abandonment.

"Today's meeting is purely an informal one," said Mr. Spencer. "We have no organization nor officers and all subjects coming up for discussion will be gone into on that basis. We have not yet decided whether we will make our findings public. If we have any recommendations to make in regards to college athletics it will be through our faculty representatives in the conference. The reports, however, that the faculty heads of the various schools contemplated discussion of proposals to eliminate intersectional games are erroneous."

Nine of the ten conference members were represented at today's meeting. They included Presidents W. J. Kerr, Oregon State; C. H. Clapp, Montana; A. B. Ball, Oregon; E. O. Holland, Washington State; M. Lyle Spencer, Washington; Rufus B. Von KleinSmid, Southern California; Robert Swain, acting president of Stanford, and Dean of Men Thomas Putman of California, representing President W. W. Campbell, who is ill. The university of Idaho was not represented.

Prospects were that the presidents would conclude their meeting this afternoon. Today is the first time they ever convened either formally or informally to discuss college athletics.

SHUTE REIGNS IN RAIN

Denny Shoots 69 and Takes Undisputed Leadership in Texas Open With Score of 137

With a 68, three under perfect figures, in his first time around, the young Los Angeles open winner scored a 69 today and found himself five strokes under par as he faced the field in the final thirty-six-hole grind tomorrow. His total of 137 was two strokes better than the 139 bagged by Espinosa for two rounds and three better than a pair of 140's held by Tony Manero, Elmsford, N. Y., and Neal McIntyre, Indianapolis, tied for third position. Espinosa turned in a par 71 today.

DENSMORE SHUTE

Shute, followed by a large gallery, stroked the same steady golf that marked his game yesterday. In thirty-six holes so far he has gone over par just once. That was on the eighth hole today. The other thirty-five either have been birdies or pars. He sank an eighteen-foot putt for a birdie 2 on the last green today. His card:

Out .....435 444 444—36
In .....344 534 442—33—69

As fine golf as the leader played under unfavorable conditions today, however, he could not match the dazzling pace set by a less-heralded pair, Paul Runyan, Little Rock, Ark., and Neal McIntyre, Indianapolis. The two professionals each clipped four strokes from par with 67s. McIntyre's 30 on the par 35 back nine was said to be a record for the layout. The spectacular round put the Indianapolis star among the to the capital of Guatemala, via, Guatemala City, 5000 feet above sea level, and a one-day visit in Mazatlan, Mex."

How's that for an itinerary, boys? Get out your geographies and see what a glorious ocean cruise awaits you if you care to buckle down between now and June and get yourself into first-class physical condition.

PLACES WIDE OPEN

The four first places in the junior and senior division of the Southern California Junior Olympic Games are as wide open as the Golden Gate. Southern California had both national champions last year and also produced the runner-up in each division.

Senior champion was Robert San Jose of San Pedro, followed by Fernando Ramos of Los Angeles.

Vane Baker of Huntington Park won the junior title and was closely pressed by Jerry Deal of Los Angeles.

The stunning, four-way victory of these youngsters at Atlantic City was one more feather in the West's cap of intersectional triumphs.

Now all but Baker are out of the picture, which is sad news to those who have seen those sterling little athletes, San Jose, Ramos and Deal do their stuff. But it is good news to thousands of Southern California youngsters who are desirous of winning that wonderful ocean voyage. For it means that every single boy in this region gets away to an even start in this year's race.

Last year the four boys named above rather hogged the limelight. They were benefited by much previous experience, having competed the year before. Many boys felt that against such veterans they didn't have a chance. That's all past now.

BAKER BECOMES SENIOR

Baker, junior title-holder, automatically goes into the senior division this year and it is entirely unlikely that he will be returned victor this time because he will find the going much rougher and the competition exceedingly tougher.

So get out your track suits, boys, and start training now for the Junior Olympic Games. You have just as good a chance of winning that trip through the Panama Canal as any boy in Southern California. The games, as those of you who competed last year will recall, are run on a coefficient basis, which means that no matter what a boy's age, height or weight, he starts on an even plane with his competitors.

The four lucky Southern California youngsters who win the Latin-American trip will not only gain for themselves an educational tour of unlimited possibilities but will enjoy a vacation such as is seldom offered boys of today.

The cruise will be an official one and Southern California's representatives will officially carry this section's invitation to all countries visited to come here for the 1932 senior Olympic Games to be held in the Los Angeles Coliseum.

Our youngsters, therefore, will not only be ambassadors of good will, cementing cordial and friendly relations between the United States and Central America, but will also carry Los Angeles' official welcome to the 1932 Olympic Games.

Boyd Comstock, nationally famous track-and-field coach, will again act as director of the Southern California Junior Olympic Games, which means that youngsters entered in the gigantic sports program will have the benefit of training under one of the best-known mentors in the world.

Comstock put the finishing touches on San Jose, Ramos, Deal and Baker last year and had them in wonderful shape for the national finals.

During the 1930 season he will make trips into all Southern California communities and will devote his time and energy to building up the physical condition of athletes in every town and village interested in this great program.

Comstock is known locally for his fine work with the Los Angeles Athletic Club track team and prior to that with the University of Southern California. He was a star athlete at the Trojan institution many years ago. Some seasons back he was head coach at Yale University.

The executive committee of the Southern California Junior Olympic Games includes William May Garland, John B. Beman, Douglas Fairbanks, Comstock, John F. Ness and the writer.

As was the case last year, student executives will be appointed in each competing school and organization. These officials aided immeasurably in making the 1929 Junior Olympic Games program a success. They act as managers for their respective teams, aiding the coach in getting his particular squad into condition for competition. Student executives also handle literature and information from Junior Olympic Games headquarters, relieving the coach of this duty.

This is great training for youn boys and gives them managerial and executive experience not easily acquired. Buttons are awarded student executives by the executive committee.

A slight revision in the system of scoring for 1930 makes the five-event program a more even test of athletic ability than was the case last year.

It is the policy of the games to make for all-around development. To this end it is requisite to have the five events each average approximately 20 per cent of the total score involved, thereby giving each event an equal status in the final result.

Check of scores for the last three years reveals that chinning the bar approached 30 per cent of the entire score involved for both juniors and seniors; the junior dash has averaged only about 17 per cent of the total and that both junior and senior basketball goal throws have fallen below the desired 20 per cent.

Athletic authorities agree that chinning is the only event of the five used in the games in which specialization is possible. Records for three years also show that twenty-three chins is the maximum normal for the junior and twenty-five the normal maximum for the senior. Additional chins above these figures constitute specialization.

While in no measure meaning to discourage the good chinner, it is not the intention of the central office to permit chinners to capture more than their share of the percentages. The following revisions, we believe, will prove popular, will more nearly equalize scores and will better compensate effort in the respective divisions of the games:

SENIORS

Chinning: Reduce excess scores above twenty-five chins from 10 points to 1 point. Resulting score average will be exactly 20 per cent.

Basketball goal throw: Reduce minimum requirement from two goals to one. Resulting score average will be 19 per cent.

JUNIORS

Chinning: Increase minimum chins required from six to eight. Reduce excess score above twenty-three (new figure for maximum on chart) from 10 points to 1 point. Check for three years discloses that juniors approach seniors in chinning, as to number of times and resulting scores. Resulting score average will be 21.4 per cent.

Basketball goal throw: Reduce minimum requirement from two goals to one. Resulting score average will be 21.1 per cent.

Dash: Reduce minimum from 11s. to 11 2-5s. Resulting score average will be 20 per cent.

The above changes will give greater compensation to the basketball events, smaller to the chinning events and greater to the junior dash.

Those who followed the Junior Olympic Games program in Southern California last year were warm in their praise of the project. With more than 35,000 boys competing, the amount of good accomplished defies computation. Suffice to say that every boy who entered the athletic program and trained diligently during its progress came out of the period a better youth physically, mentally and socially. Every boy who applied himself properly to the task before him could not help but reap great benefit from such application.

Entry blanks will be sent to schools, clubs and other organizations in Southern California.

Remember this, boys: In order to enter you must be a member of some school, club, Scout troop or similar organization. You can't enter as an individual. It is necessary that your school enter.

Ask your athletic director for an entry blank and if he isn't already supplied with these the necessary material will be forwarded upon application at Junior Olympic Games headquarters in The Times Building, First and Broadway, Los Angeles.

It's never too early to start training. The lure of that wonderful ocean cruise of inestimable educational and scenic value should spur every eligible boy in Southern California to great heights.

There's no rule against your beginning training immediately. Those of you who were in the program last year know how simple a matter it is to improve your records by merely applying yourself to the task at hand. Some of you may not make astounding scores right off the bat, but with proper coaching and persistent application your point total can be steadily enlarged until you are able to take your place with the best in the game.

A thought worth remembering—every boy in Southern California is away to an even start. There are no holdover stars from last year. Revised scoring makes the test one of more equality than ever before. You have just as much chance of winning that Latin America trip as any boy in Southern California. Get into the program now.

Being anything but believers in that axiom about turning the other cheek, the aspiring Hollywood Millionaires will swing the other fist at the San Francisco Tigers when the two clubs do battle tomorrow night in a California Hockey League embroglio at the Winter Garden Ice Palace.

The Millionaires turned the one cheek last Monday, only to have the Tigers smite it, 4-to-3, in an overtime tussle up north. It went into overtime and then the Tigers were only able to win because Eagle," Leo Cook, shot at the net in minutes and it went the fracas.

new record would be set in the ski jump when several jumpers cleared better than 130 feet both yesterday and today. The take-off was set back eight feet to enable jumpers to shatter existing records. Indications were that before the finals a new record would be hung up—probably by Bjorngaard, probably America's foremost stylist in ski jumping. Yesterday, in practice, he cleared 126 feet.

Twenty-three thousand people are expected here tomorrow.

with his team of puppies, finished last today, but was entirely satisfied with the performance. His wheel dog is 5 years of age, but the rest of the outfit is composed of 7-year-old Irish setter puppies. This is their first race, and he is training them for a real effort next year. The popular little team insists on racing its heart out in the first few miles, despite everything Robie can do to hold it back. They were all tired out for the up-grade return, and Robie let them tag along just as fast as they wanted to go.

Fay Delesene's team of malamutes—the only one of its kind in the race—is holding down fifth place, ready to make a strong bid tomorrow for one of the money prizes. The malamutes aren't as speedy as the other teams, but they're twice as powerful and enduring as anything else in the race. If any of the leaders falter tomorrow the malamutes will be a cinch to finish well.

Thula Geelan, only woman entrant, finished behind everybody but the puppy team today. Her dogs were very tired, apparently worn out by her third place effort yesterday.

An unusual feature of today's entertainment was the simultaneous performances of Lars Haugen, nationally known ski jumper, and a speedy power cruiser, not more than a couple of hundred yards apart. While Haugen was dazzling the large crowd of fans with his leaps of more than 150 feet the speedboat was roaring around the blue-green waters of beautiful Lake Tahoe. Southern Pacific officials declare that all attendance records will be broken for the final run tomorrow. The observation car, a la Poughkeepsie, which travels down the track which parallels the dog course, gives all the fans a chance to keep track of the entrants every foot of the way. It is certain that the course record will be fractured. Fred Printz, who won the opener last year, raced the first two days in 5h. 47m., and no less than five drivers have bettered that mark this year. The standings:

1—Roy Stover (McCall, Idaho,) 5:00:58.
2—Delbert Gerdom (Rigby, Idaho,) 5:10:28.
3—Earl Kimball (Cascade, Idaho,) 5:10:38.
4—Tud Kent (Ashton, Idaho,) 5:31:31.
5—Fay Delesene (Truckee,) 5:40:23.
6—Roe Peterson (St. Anthony, Idaho,) 5:40:[illegible].
7—Thula Geelan (McCall, Idaho,) 5:31:46.
8—Wendell Robie (Auburn, Cal.,) 7:06:00.
9—Charley Kennedy (Ashton, Idaho,) withdrew.

ABOUT "KING" KELLY

A RECENT reference to Fred (King) Kelly in this column has brought some interesting comment on the former Southern California hurdling star from a correspondent.

"Brings to my mind the recent ado about ovations to our leading football players," writes E. L. H. 'Surely they were great and well merited, but the greatest ovation of all was the silent ovation given to "King" Kelly when he was finally dethroned by that great hurdler, Earl Thompson, from Long Beach, then a freshman at S.C. and later the world's champion.

"Fred Kelly was surely deserving of it, too. A more princely athlete there never was. But about his ovation. It was so silent you could have heard a match drop. It was from the bottom of every one's heart, and brought a tear to many an eye that day.

"I will never forget Kelly and Thompson going back to the dressing-room. Then Kelly came back on the track an hour later to equal the world's low-hurdle record around a curve, and proved he was not through yet.

The high-hurdle mark of 14 2-5s, which Kelly made against California but was not allowed because one of the watches caught him at 15s, was correct. He had form and speed in that race and fairly glided down the track. I will always be positive that Kelly was the first to do 14 2-5s.

"In the recent case of the lost aviator Maurice Graham, Kelly has proved that he is a world's champion as a man. (Graham was a brother air pilot of Kelly in the mail service.)"

E. L. H. then proceeds with a few "Remember Whens:"

"The great game of tackle played by Willard (Scow) Curry, a freshman, against the University of Oregon at old Bovard Field in 1915.

"Don Williams, intestinal fortitude, carrying the ball, catching punts, the greatest receiver of punts I ever saw. . . . If he only weighed fifteen or twenty more pounds.

"The exhausted condition of the players in the last quarter of the S.C.-Stanford game at Palo Alto last fall."

THREE CUBAN FIGHTERS

ONE of the three great Cuban fighters, Armando Santiago, is here to box Billy Townsend February 11. The other two Cuban stars are Kid Chocolate, who has won 185 straight battles, and Black Bill, who has the New York flyweight tournament practically cinched.

Santiago is the great punching junior lightweight who either knocks his opponents out or gets bounced. His percentage of kayos runs higher than his losses.

In fifty fights he has registered twenty-five knockouts—numbering among them Benny Bass and Joey Sangor. Bass claimed a foul, but Frank Churchill, who manages the Cuban, says the blow was nothing but a left hook to the pit of the stomach.

In a rematch Bass knocked Santiago out after being on the floor three times himself. Tony Canzoneri stopped the Cuban after being on the canvas twice—once for the full nine count.

Santiago has been knocked out but three times. Besides Bass and Canzoneri he was once nailed by Mike Dundee.

Townsend holds the lightweight championship of Canada and is strictly a right-hand knockout fighter. In one fight here Townsend hit Wildcat Carter eight times and knocked him down each lick.

The Santiago-Townsend fight comes under the category of being a sure-fire punching duel with odds about even to start.

Santiago is 21 years old, has a high-school education and holds the featherweight, lightweight and welterweight titles in Cuba.

LA BARBA AND TAYLOR

FOR the steenth time the La Barba-Taylor fight is off.

Practically certain of going through with a contract which was signed here two years ago but never consummated, Taylor has been called east for another bout with Earl Mastro.

Taylor's manager, Eddie Long, has signed for Taylor to meet Mastro at Chicago March 16. Taylor is guaranteed $12,500 with a privilege of 25 per cent of the gate receipts.

The blond-headed boy from Terra Haute had motored here expressly to meet La Barba this spring, but the feud with Mastro has grown into such box-office proportions that it cannot be spurned.

Mastro and Taylor have fought twice. The first meeting was a draw. The second bout brought a technical knockout in Mastro's favor. The boys knocked each other out of the ring in a terrid mix-up on the ropes. Mastro was able to crawl back inside. Taylor twisted his torso and had to quit.

The bout attracted over 17,000 persons to the Chicago Stadium, and the gate receipts were over $63,000.

Thereby hangs the tale of the 1930 jinx on the Taylor-La Barba fight.

It has been hanging fire for four years, but always from some cause or another—injuries, conflicts in dates and whatnot—it has never been staged.

THE JUNIOR LIGHTIES

THE junior lightweights hold the boards again this week—Joey Sangor and Eddie Mack at the Olympic and Cecil Payne and Johnny Lamar at Hollywood.

Sangor and Lamar are the old warhorses. Mack and Payne are the youngsters.

It will be Freckle-faced Joey's second fight since his comeback quest.

Joey retired a year ago, ostensibly never to fight again.

Joey retired a year ago, ostensibly never to fight against.

But stock-market reverses and "dead" real-estate holdings forced the little fellow to go back to the wars.

Here he fought his most popular fights, and here he achieved his greatest successes.

It is only natural therefore that the freckle-faced Milwaukeean should return here to start the climb all over again.

Hymie Rudin will fight the four-round special event against Frankie Abendino at 135 pounds. Four-round preliminaries will be: Bill Wagner vs. Joe Para, 165 pounds; Glen Dinger vs. Frank Leonard, 148 pounds.

SAN LUIS GIANTS LOSE

It took the Pirrone All-Stars an extra inning to beat the San Luis Giants, 5 to 4, at White Sox Park yesterday. The Philadelphia Royal Giants suffered a 5-to-2 defeat at the same time in Long Beach, where the Shell Oils took the first game in the winter league championship play-off. Pirrone takes his warriors to San Diego today and the Royal Giants return to Long Beach.

"Triangular meet with St. Mary's which scored 19 points.

BY BRAVEN DYER

See by the papers that Emerson (Bud) Spencer, the meanest quarter-miler ever developed on the Pacific Coast, feels that the University of Southern California track team should defeat Stanford, his alma mater, in the annual dual meet between these two rivals.

"DINK" TEMPLETON

Knowing Spencer fairly well I know that he doesn't expect any such thing at all.

"Bud" was brought out by Dink Templeton and whatever he (Spencer) says in the papers, you can rest assured that he expects his coach to pull another one out of the hat and slip over a victory on Dean Cromwell.

The writer also recalls Templeton's own prediction following the annual west coast relays at Fresno last spring. Dink had just finished reading a list of junior college track athletes who were contemplating entering Southern California, thereby making themselves eligible for the 1930 track team. Among them were such stars of national ranking as Frank Wykoff, Jeddy Welsh and Bill McGeagh.

"Whew," ejaculated Dink while mopping his brow, "that's some list."

PREDICTS VICTORY

"Looks like I will have to quit coaching after next year (1930) but I'll beat Dean once more, you can bank on that," was Dink's parting shot.

Well, the athletes eventually enrolled at Southern California and when I saw Templeton down here at the time of the Trojan-California football game I asked him if he hadn't changed his mind about beating Cromwell this spring.

"It does look bad, doesn't it?" was Dink's query. "But they haven't got me licked yet and I guess I'll have to stick to my prediction."

So regardless of what Bud Spencer may say in the papers, his coach expects to win the dual meet again this year, and it's my guess that Bud really feels the same way about it.

Although the influx of star athletes at Southern California does, at first glance, seem to make Templeton's task a tough one, things are not nearly as dark as they appear on the surface.

Last year Stanford defeated the Trojans, 74 to 57. Of those 74 points Templeton has back 36 3-4. Which means that Dink, at this writing, is possessed of approximately half as much strength as he had last year.

Of Troy's 57 points, Cromwell has back exactly 36, which is also approximately half of what S.C. was able to score against the Cards a year ago.

Therefore, it is a question of which coach can best develop the remaining points necessary to victory. Templeton has a 9-point start on his rival. There's that much to be said on Dink's side of the ledger.

As for Dean, he is naturally away to a flying start by virtue of acquiring such consistent performers as Wykoff, Welsh, McGeagh and this chap Lee Hansen, one of the Coast's best milers, who transferred from Oregon State.

GREAT BATTLE LOOMS

It, therefore looks like a great battle. Templeton is one of the greatest developers of raw material in track-and-field history, and it will be interesting to see what he does in the present situation.

Stanford will again swamp Southern California in the field, unless Bob Hall, the big football player, shows unusual development as a shot-and-discus heaver. Templeton starts with Eric Krenz, Harlow Rothert and Herb Fleishhacker in the shot and the first two in the discus. This means 17 points right off the bat, which is something of a handicap for Cromwell to combat.

Offhand, it would appear that Stanford's best chance of cutting into Troy's points on the track will be in the 440 and hurdles. Wykoff, Draper and Maurer should knock off a flock of digits for the Trojans in the two sprints, and if Hec Dyer takes second in each race for Stanford Templeton will undoubtedly be greatly relieved.

The story has been going the rounds that Dink has said he expects to see Dyer trim Wykoff in one of the two races. Dink is generally pretty sane so we'll all have to admit such a thing might happen, particularly as young Hector is a fine sprinter, but most of us will be content to string along with Glendale Frank until something unusual takes place.

Morrison and Shove and Ike Hables from the frosh, will give Stanford a lot of strength in the one-lap event. Morrison, best of the three, lost to Vic Williams of Troy in the dual meet last year, but reversed the decision later. Hables may bob up as a sprinter and he has done well in the shorter races.

There is no telling what will happen in the hurdle races. If Stanford should get the majority of points here it would probably bring the outcome of the meet right down to the relay. Podge Smith is Dink's best bet in the highs, while Dyer is going to be used in the lows. Much depends on what material Templeton can develop here.

The Trojans have quite a bulge on Stanford right at the start with a hurdler of Welsh's capabilities and such a supporting cast as Bill Carls and Ernie Payne.

The high jump is a tough event to dope, the two teams being about a stand-off here, unless Van Cadel of the Trojans can become consistent at 6ft. 2in., in competition. He is capable of this and better.

Development of a strong javelin thrower will help Stanford a lot, although Troy's strength in this event is by no means assured, what with Jess Mortensen having injured both shoulders during the football season. He is far and away the leading tosser on either team, having bettered 200ft. last year.

If it comes down to the relay Stanford will have to be conceded a slight edge.

One thing is fairly certain, Cromwell will probably never have a better chance of beating the Cards than that afforded him this season. If Dean doesn't turn the trick this year, it is hard to see when he will make it.

Cromwell evidently feels the same way about it, for over the radio the other night he declared that he thought "Southern California would be able to win the dual meet, all right, but that Stanford would probably finish first in the I.C.4-A. affair again."

LEAGUE TILTS ON SCHEDULE

Three Southern California Conference Cage Contests on Tap For Week-end; Bulldogs Face Poets

Three Southern California conference basketball games are scheduled for Saturday night which marks the fifth week of the 1930 race for the circuit championship. Occidental, the 1929 champions, already has been definitely eliminated from the title-contending group. Redlands is the favorite with Pomona a close second choice.

Redlands faces Whittier at Whittier this week-end. The Poets are a possible winner over the Bulldogs. Unless the Whittier quintet can master the the league leaders, the Sagehens must conquer the Redlands team next week, the 15th, when the two fives clash at Pomona, or the crown goes to the Bulldogs.

Pomona and Occidental clash in the second conference meeting of this week-end. It is the first of a two-game series between these ancient rivals, the second and final game scheduled for the 22nd of this month at Pomona. This week's game will be staged at Glendale High gym, home floor of the Tigers.

The strong La Verne quintet has an easy week-end, being matched against the weak Caltech five in a contest billed for the Pasadena gym of the Engineers. So far the Engineers have yet to win a conference argument but have little chance of upsetting the Leopards. A triumph over the visitors would be nothing less than a miracle.

The fact that the Oxy mentor, Coach Eddie Kienholz, failed to find a capable combination from among his list of six letter men is set forth as one of the reasons for the downfall of the Tigers in defense of their championship this season. Furthermore, none of the letter winners had played together in any one combination before, and it required several changes and experiments before the Oxy coach had found the correct five—if he has.

FROSTY PETERS TO GO INTO BUSINESS HERE

CHAMPAIGN (Ill.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Forrest (Frosty) Peters, star quarterback of the University of Illinois for the past three seasons, will withdraw from school at the close of the present semester to accept a business offer in Los Angeles, and play football with the Olympic Club. Peters also is said to have been offered $5000 a year to play football with a coast professional eleven.

MERCURIES BOAST GREAT ARRAY OF TRACK TALENT

BY BUD SPENCER
World's 400-Meter Champion

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 1.—The Los Angeles Athletic Club, out of the dual track meet competition last season, is returning to the fold this spring boasting a fancy combination of talent. The Mercuries are quite proud of the fact that they are the only team to defeat Stanford in the past three years—that defeat being administered two years ago a la Charles Paddock, Nick Carter, Bob Maxwell and John Kuck.

CHARLES W. PADDOCK

On March 1 in the Stanford stadium, according to the L.A.A.C. patrons, the season is going to be inaugurated with a bang. The bang will come, says Charles Keppen, club track commissioner, when the big guns of the Mercury start pounding out a few first places and enough seconds and thirds to make it two up for L.A.A.C.

Take a look at this collection of stars—a nifty combination of past, present and would-be greats that will wear the colors of the Los Angeles Athletic Club.

PADDOCK BACK

Charles Paddock still has itchy feet, according to his latest announcement, and may find that he has a few more good races left in the legs that have brought him to his thirteenth year of track competition, "a better than ten-flat man." The chances are that Paddock, now writer and hard-working man, will find the going too tough until April. In all justice to a great runner it should be said that he will reach his tiptop form about June or July.

Alf Ray, a slender youth from Doane College, should be the club's most reliable sprinter. He has done better than ten flat and close to twenty-one seconds in the 100 and furlong, respectively. He is in good shape already, and by the time of the Stanford meet he should be capable of an argument with Hector Dyer, Stanford's classy sprinter. Murray Schultz, former Caltech star, and Ken Pinney from Pomona will be the supporting members of the cast.

The quarter-milers won't raise any too much dust as far as Stanford is concerned. Oliver Worden, San Diego State runner, may do better than fifty flat—a speed that was just about his best while in college. Walt Clark, who showed some great possibilities at times while on the California track team last season, and Weyland Chapman, former Hollywood High star, are fifty-flat runners. Chapman, running under club colors a couple of years ago, ran home to a forty-nine and one-fifth quarter against U.S.C.; a time that shows what the boy can do.

IOWA BACK IN GOOD GRACES

tests of any kind with other members of the conference. Iowa may have a few open dates on its schedule and these may be filled by other Big Ten elevens. Some coaches who are friendly toward the Hawkeyes may rearrange their gridiron slates in order to give Iowa a game.

DUAL MEETS LIKELY

The same is true of other branches of intercollegiate activity. Coach George Bresnahan is free to enter his teams in the indoor and outdoor track-and-field championship. He can also slate dual meets with other conference teams. Iowa now can go ahead and plan for next year's schedules in all lines of athletics.

The faculty committee was in session for four and one-half hours. The report of the eligibility was read by Prof Williams Marshall, secretary of the committee. Although there was a friendly feeling toward Iowa, some of the professors wanted to make sure of certain points.

When Iowa was suspended from the conference twenty-seven athletes were involved. Eleven of these are now in school, but Iowa authorities will probably heed the supplementary resolution and make no effort to ask for their reinstatement.

It was pointed out the special meeting of the faculty committee was called upon the request of the eligibility committee, which did not find conditions at Iowa City as bad as reported.

The eleven athletes named in the committee's supplementary resolution were:

Monte Stewart, swimmer; Theon Boyer, pole vaulter; Floyd Mitchell, basketball; Mike Farrah, captain-elect of the 1930 football team; Seward Leeka, basketball and football; Lawrence Benson, basketball; Boyd Liddle, swimmer; Doyle Plunkitt, basketball; Irvin Nelson, football, basketball and baseball; Pete Affre, football, and Henry Mosgrove, baseball. These athletes were charged with accepting money through promissory notes, from the so-called Iowa slush fund.

Joey Sangor and Eddie Mack Settle Fistic Differences Tuesday Night at Olymp

TWO FAVORITES MATCH WALLOPS

Milwaukee Veteran Battles Denver College Boy

High-power Contest Looms Here for Local Fans

Beum and Fraser Collide in Semi-Wind-Up Bout

BY KAY OWE

Eddie Mack of Denver and Joey Sangor of Milwaukee hook up Tuesday night at the Olympic in what looks like the most high-powered bout staged so far this year under the auspices of Promotor Jack Doyle.

S. MASTERS

The weight is 132½ pounds—give or take a half pound. Managers seldom quibble over the fractions, but Lou Sangor and Joe Roth battled it out to the half pounds in this case.

Sangor is light. He is only carrying 130 pounds in the gymnasium right now. Mack, however, had been out of the ring for nearly two months and did not know exactly what notch he would make.

Mack has spent the last few weeks doing a lot of outdoor work on a ranch in New Mexico and is in fine shape. He is a 136-pounder, too, when in steady training.

TWO FAVORITES

The fight brings together two favorites—both from outside cities, who have edged their way into popularity here by sensational fights.

Mack has made four starts in the Olympic. He knocked out Baby Sal Sorio and Doc Snell and took decisions from Goldie Hess and Tod Morgan.

In the fight with Morgan, Mack was off stride due to an injury to his collar bone. He had to call off a second Hess bout due to the fracture. Rest has put him back to normal.

Sangor's fight with Santiago Zorilla last December found him in need of a lot of work to get his boxing eye back again. He looked rather ragged for a Sangor the first five rounds, but snapped back to form the last five heats.

Both Mack and Sangor have played to sellout houses here and with both of them in the same ring Doyle should have his biggest gate so far for 1930. The Bert Colima-Jose Peregrina bout, which put $10,000 through the cash register, will undoubtedly be bigger this week.

With both boys being backed heavily, nothing else but even money has showed up to date. Mack's height and reach advantage may cause some to lean his way. But Sangor had experience of this kind before in fighting Bud Taylor.

All of the Taylor-Sangor fights were bitter arguments. Sangor once stopped Taylor with a left hook to the body in Chicago. The Taylor crowd always claimed the blow was low, but the judges did not see it that way.

Mack stands up straight and moves in and out with a one-two attack which makes him very effective. Both his wins over Hess and Morgan were very close. The Hess engagement was by far the better to watch.

FIGHT ALIKE

Hess and Sangor fight alike in the respect that they continually move in and throw punches. Sangor is much the stiffer socker, however.

The Sangor-Mack bout is backed up by a star semi-wind-up. It features Harry Beum and Wally Fraser. They are young heavyweights.

Beum suffered a reverse when Frankie Campbell toppled him. He came back to score a knockout over Walter Hoffman. Fraser is a youngster. He tried to go ten rounds with Joe Bitto not long ago, but gave out at that distance and lost on a technical kayo.

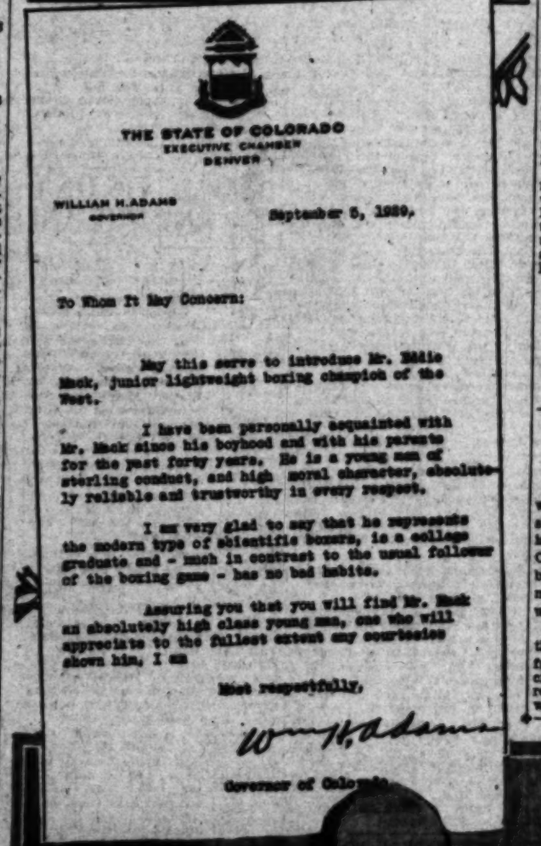
Over the six-round distance Fraser is all right and figures to make a tough fight of it with Beum, who is managed and handled by George Blake.

Freddie Tompkins, young stablemate of Sangor's, comes back in a rematch with Willie Fausto. Tompkins won the decision in a thrilling preliminary a few weeks ago. It is good copy for a second fight.

The other two bouts are Pat Cunningham vs. Guy Salerno and Bobby Flores vs. Jack Stephens. Cunningham is a good prospect and promises to fight his way up the card quickly. He is a middleweight.

MACK WINS HIS LETTER

Back in Colorado Eddie Mack, the Regis College boy, is well thought of, as the letter below seems to indicate. The inset is a letter written by Gov. H. A. Adams to the little lightweight champion of the Rockies. The picture shows Mack and his manager Joe Roth looking over the valuable parchment.



THE STATE OF COLORADO
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER DENVER

GOVERNOR

September 5, 1929.

To Whom It May Concern:

May this serve to introduce Mr. Eddie Mack, junior lightweight boxing champion of the West.

I have been personally acquainted with Mr. Mack since his boyhood and with his parents for the past forty years. He is a young man of sterling conduct, and high moral character, absolutely reliable and trustworthy in every respect.

I am very glad to say that he represents the modern type of scientific boxers, is a college graduate and - much in contrast to the usual follower of the boxing game - has no bad habits.

Assuring you that you will find Mr. Mack an absolutely high class young man, one who will appreciate to the fullest extent any courtesies shown him, I am

Most respectfully,

Wm. H. Adams

Governor of Colorado.

DEMPSEY FAILS TO SEE CHAMP IN CURRENT CROP

BY WALTER ECKERSALL

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—Jack Dempsey, former world's heavyweight champion who is now promoting fights in Chicago, does not believe a real champion will be developed from any of the present crop of heavyweights. Although Dempsey did admit Jack Sharkey of Boston is about the best of the lot, the former title holder does not rank him in the same class with previous champions.

It is Jack's contention, the next real heavyweight champion of the world will be developed suddenly. He may be a product of the amateur ranks or may be just a big, uncouth fellow with plenty of heart and one who can punch with either hand.

"I like the puncher," Jack said in a recent interview in Chicago, "When I was champion, I met many fighters whom I knew I could beat because they could not hit. I purposely permitted them to hit me so that I could nail them with either hand. The moment a fighter turns loose a punch he leaves himself open.

"When I met Firpo, I took his punches to land some myself. At the time, however, I did not think he could hit as hard as he did. That punch which sent me out of the ring was about the hardest I ever caught. I came back and finally beat him.

"There is not what might be called a real puncher in the heavyweight division. Sharkey hits fairly hard but not stiff enough to be called dangerous. Gene Tunney was never a puncher but he was a polished boxer. He beat me twice through his boxing ability and I never could get a square shot at either of his jaws. Aside from Sharkey, there are no punchers in the heavyweight ranks.

"Another essential which goes to make a heavyweight champion is heart and plenty of it. If a fighter is knocked down, that is the time he should show his real courage. Some punches are more serious than others, but the fellow who is knocked flat and then gets up to carry on is the fighter who will go a long way."

LITTLE MORO WINS

MANILA, Feb. 1. (AP)—Little Moro, weight 117 pounds, won the decision tonight from Young Nacionalista, featherweight champion of the Orient, after twelve rounds of fast boxing. Young Nacionalista did not make the bantam limit and no title was involved.

Moro outboxed Nacionalista throughout, causing him to miss frequently and to appear slow. Nacionalista had Moro helpless on the ropes in the third and eighth rounds with hard punches, but could not land the knockout wallop. Moro rallied each time and scored repeatedly with right jabs to Nacionalista's head.

Max Tarley, who weighed 125, stopped Trench King, 130-pound fighter of Fresno, Cal., in the third round. A right to the chin dropped King in the first round for five seconds. He rallied and had the advantage in the second round. Opening the third round, Tarley smashed King with body blows and then floored him twice with rights to the chin. King's seconds threw in a towel to save him from further punishment.

MARSHALL WILL FACE SARPOLIS

Young Heavyweights Meet in Mat Feature

Airplane-Spin Sensation Takes on Doctor

Cantonwine, Thye to Face in Second Event

BY RALPH HUSTON

Just to prove that success and popularity haven't gone to his head, Everett Marshall, the latest "fair-haired boy" in local wrestling circles, will take on Dr. Karl Sarpolis, the Cleveland physician, in the main event of Lou Daro's semi-monthly program Wednesday night.

LOU DARO

Marshall, who has his eye on the world's heavyweight crown, has beaten Joe Malcewicz and Stanley Stasiak in straight falls, and rather figured that he was due for tougher competition if such could be found. He hoped for Ed "Strangler" Lewis, or Joe Stecher, or even Dick Daviscourt, if necessary. Daro hoped so, too, but both Lewis and Daviscourt turned down the match as flatly as possible.

Whereat the eminent doctor stepped upon the scene. He pointed to two victories over Ira Dern, another exponent of the airplane spin—Marshall's favorite hold. He remarked about two draw bouts with the ever-popular Nick Lutze, who had beaten both Malcewicz and Stasiak. He called to mind a victory over John Evko, who resembles Stasiak and Hans Steinke in proportions. "Carnation Lou" considered, asked Marshall what he thought of the idea, and Marshall replied, as he always has, "I'll wrestle anybody."

At that, it ought to be a pretty good match. The dear doctor, in his lone appearance here, held Dick Daviscourt to a draw, which put a halt to a winning streak that the San Diego avocado grower had been indulging in. The visitor showed a lot of ability at applying unexpected holds, particularly the flying body scissors. He took punishment from Davis's headlocks and toeholds, but he managed to eventually squirm out of all damaging positions without considerable difficulty.

In his appearances here—four of them—Marshall's foes haven't been able to get a clean hold on him. Don DeLaun couldn't do it in two attempts; Joe Malcewicz wasn't even close to getting one; and Stasiak almost got a hold on five different times, only to have Marshall slip away and turn up with a punishing arm lock on his opponent.

The bout promises to be one of the cleanest and fastest ever seen here. Neither Marshall nor Sarpolis tries anything rough — Marshall being especially clean, and neither wastes any time while in the ring.

Howard Cantonwine and Ted Thye, a couple of ancient and honored veterans hook up in the second bout. Cantonwine has not appeared here in more than a year. At that time he wrestled Malcewicz, Jim Browning, Lutze, Marin Plestina and the like. He attended the University of Iowa, playing football and wrestling there some years before Marshall. Thye is a former middleweight champion.

WANTED---A PARACHUTE

Here is Everett Marshall, the young aspirant to the heavyweight wrestling crown, who meets Dr. Karl Sarpolis in feature engagement of the Olympic program Wednesday night. Marshall is shown using the airplane spin—his pet hold—on his partner. And the spin is just as deadly to Marshall's foes as it is in a real plane.

CLOWN BOXERS BASK IN SPOTLIGHT

Dearth of First-Class Heavyweight Brings Burlesquers to Fore as Ring Performers; Carnero's Feet Draw Fans

BY JOHN P. GALLAGHER
"Times" Staff Correspondent

CHICAGO, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The present dearth of real heavyweight boxers is surely proving a boon to the burlesquers. Whether it is because comedy draws as well as melodrama or whether foreign names intrigue the American lovers of the manly art, or both, the fans certainly turn out in profitable numbers, which is, after all, what counts so far as the promoters are concerned.

Amidst riotous cheering and sustained choruses of "vivas," Primo Carnera, the 3-year-old giant from Italy, whose outstanding peculiarity is extraordinarily big feet, made his ring debut here last Friday against Eisaac Mioux, French - Canadian heavyweight, at the Stadium. Although the bout was anything but a boxing match as Americans know that form of entertainment, the Italian circus youth drew a full house.

PRIMO CARNERA

It was the second capacity crowd he drew within a week. The Friday night previous at Madison Square Garden when Primo met Big Boy Peterson there wasn't a vacant seat in the place. And it is a pretty safe bet that the ponderous Italian will draw to capacity wherever he shows because he seems to have captured the imagination of those with a flair for the unconventional.

Carnera, who may demonstrate his agility or lack of it to Los Angeles boxing fans before returning to Europe with his pockets full of perfectly good American dollars, is not such a big man as big men go. The so-called giant is six feet seven inches tall and weighs 269 pounds in fighting trim. His other measurements are: Chest, forty-eight inches normal, fifty-four inches expanded; waist, thirty-eight inches; biceps, eighteen inches; forearm, sixteen inches; calf, nineteen inches; thigh, thirty inches; neck, twenty inches.

Jess Willard is six feet seven inches tall and at the time he fought Jack Dempsey in 1919 weighed 265 pounds. Some other big men seen in American rings in recent years were Quintin Romero, Victorio Campolo and Luis Angel Firpo, not to mention George Godfrey. And the records show that Charley Freeman, a ring gladiator back in 1842, was six feet ten and one-half inches tall and built in proportion.

Carnera, like his kind, is big and strong and can deliver a fair blow, but nothing like what his size and dimensions would indicate. His punches are not real punches, but heavy, ponderous pushes. They are lacking in snap and speed, and for that reason they do not drop an opponent cold and numb in his tracks. Instead, they send their recipient staggering or reeling away, but not particularly hurt.

When fight managers go hunting for champions they do not pick giants who can only maul like huge bears. They select men of better than ordinary stature, strong, muscular, lithe and supple, who can strike like a tiger, quickly and powerfully. The two types of men were seen at their best when Jack Dempsey took the heavyweight championship away from Jess Willard at Toledo, O., nearly eleven years ago.

Willard, the giant, thinking he could cut down the smaller Dempsey with one herculean blow, stepped ponderously to the middle of the ring, threw up a pair of huge arms and pawed awkwardly at his flitting adversary. But Jack knew how to avoid that one blow. Circling the big fellow like a tiger circles his prey, Jack lightly stepped out of the way of Willard's great fists, and then, quick as lightning, stepped in to deliver the murderous blows that simply paralyzed his giant opponent.

Of course, none of the real boxing fans are taking Carnera seriously at this time, especially in view of the fact that Young Stribling dropped the big fellow in each of their two matches and because Primo is admittedly undeveloped as a boxer, but who will say that it is not within the realm of possibility that in time this young giant may become the champion heavyweight pugilist of the world? Two years of intensive American training would immeasurably help this young big man of the gargantuan feet and there is no Jack Dempsey nor anyone within hailing distance of Dempsey's class to cut the invader down.

Meanwhile, Max Schmeling of Germany and Phil Scott of England are seeking world honors undoubtedly with a view to cashing in before America can produce another Dempsey or Tunney or Corbett or Sullivan.

UPLIFTERS AND BLUE FOUR MIX

Rival Mallet Squads Clash in Rematch Today

Uplifters Club polo ists will saddle their ponies this afternoon at 3:30 determined to gallop away with their second victory over the Santa Monica Blues. Last week these two teams rode out a furious mallet battle and the same kind of mounted warfare is predicted for the Beverly Boulevard arena today.

LYELL PUCKETT

The opening game of the ranch polo schedule saw the Uplifters colors carried to an 8-to-6 victory. For seven and a half chukkers of play it was anybody's ball game. In the closing minutes of action Lyell Puckett sent the little white ball skimming through the goal posts for the winning tally and a few seconds later Lionel Pedley clinched the game with another marker.

Play starts at 2:30.

ordered. Glad to correct the wrong impression, Steve.

To be reasonably sure of winning the title in this section all Troy has to do is to win two of her three remaining games.

Hubert Caldwell, 206-pound Trojan guard, has been playing great basketball for Sam Barry. He is only a sophomore, but has proved himself a fine defensive athlete and a timely man at caging the cassabe. Caldwell felt rather badly Saturday night when he inadvertently passed the ball to Nellson, California forward, under California's basket and thereby presented the Bears with 2 points at a time when such a margin looked big as a house. But the big fellow came back a few moments later to tie the score with a neat field goal of his own.

Capt. Johnny Lehners and Mortensen are the only seniors on the squad, which means that Barry will have a fair nucleus to start the 1931 season.

Loss of Carl Shy at a crucial time, hurt U.C.L.A. a lot this year. Caddy Works does not get material to compare with that at the other institutions and it's a wonder he turns out the teams he does.

Payne, Lamar to Top Card at Hollywood

Cecil Payne and Johnny Lamar top the Hollywood American Legion fight card Friday night and Tom Gallery will guarantee that this fight will go more than a round. This shot is one of the sweetest matches booked at the stadium in a long, long time. Payne will be remembered for the fights he put up with Goldie Hess and Lamar is a Mexican who hasn't ever been given credit for his fighting ability. Only last week in San Francisco he flattened Charley Greenbark. In San Francisco Lamar is a regular headliner and can get work as often as he sees fit to fight.

Good matches in the fight game are scarce. Some look good on paper, but in reality they are busts. The Lamar-Payne fight brings together a pair of experienced maulers. Lamar would like to cop this fight which would establish him as a top-notcher. By beating Payne he could get a crack at Goldie Hess, Eddie Mack, Tod Morgan or any of the boys who are getting big money.

Tommy McGough fights a newcomer to the local fight colony in Manuel De Leon. McGough has shown plenty of ability in the few fights he has had in the preliminary ranks. De Leon must be a good boy to even get a draw with the New Yorker. Other fights on the card are Jack Hurd and Jimmy Lyall, light-heavyweights in the second spot; Tommy Hoffman and Milton Berglund, welterweights in the special event, and Freddie Welch and Red Millette in the curtain-raiser.

The game brought out a number of interesting riding duels between the famous Midwick twins, Pedley and Boeseke, against Balding, Sanford and Howard of the Hurricanes. Pedley and Boeseke had the fans roaring with cheers with their spectacular performances. The same can be said of Balding, Sanford and Howard, all of whom turned in some fine polo.

Baseball S SCRAP

The longest Coast League base game played in Los Angeles curred in the opening week of 1921 season.

Seattle when Seattle and Los Angeles battled twenty-two innings. The teams are said to have established a baseball record for a game of eight length, only two errors being chalked up in the long drawn out contest. Howard Ledbetter, at third base had eleven assists and three put-outs. Art Griggs handled thirty chances at first-base without an error. Dixie Carroll had ten putouts and one assist in the outfield.

One of the greatest pitching staffs ever assembled was the one which carried for the Chicago Cubs, winners of three successive National League pennants in 1906-1907-1908. The pitching staff included Brown, Overall, Ruibach, Lundgren, Pfeister and Reulbach. Each one of them could win crucial ball games, something which many great pitchers can do. In capturing three straight pennants the previous pitching staff scored 32 shutouts—an average of 107 wins a season.

Jimmy Whalen set up a Coast League record for pitchers when he handled 191 assists during the season. Whalen toiled in sixty-five contests, for San Francisco carried only five regular pitchers that year. Ed Bryan of Sacramento topped all pitchers in assists with ninety-six last season, the best record in four years.

STRIBLING HIT HARDEST BEFORE HOMETOWN FANS

BY W. L. (YOUNG) STRIBLING

[Copyright, 1930, by North American Newspaper Alliance.]

"Red" Herring hit me the hardest blow I ever got, before a hometown crowd in Macon, Ga. as I slumped on to the stool.

YOUNG STRIBLING

"Red" and I had boxed a ten-round draw before. In those days Herring was the big noise in the South. He had fought Benny Leonard a few years before, sticking around for six rounds before Benny located his chin. "Red" was a shrewd baby in the ring, and a crack showman to boot.

Somewhere about the middle of our party "Red" pulled a right from behind his back and threw it at me. It caught me square on the jaw. Everything turned black. I had been stung before in some of my fights, but this time, they told me, I was ready to be knocked out. I did some funny things standing up. Generally the sound of a bell is just a signal to begin or stop fighting. To me the gong sounded as it does to hungry loggers in a lumber camp at chow time.

It took me a round and a half to get over "Red's" surprise. Then the fog lifted, and believe me, I kept my eyes open. In the eighth I floored "Red" for eight, and I sure enjoyed the rest.

"Red" was tired in the tenth. To be honest, I was all out of steam myself. As I made for my corner after it was over and I had won, Pa, who always acts as my adviser, started a lecture.

"What in the world were you doing up there letting him hit you with rights and lefts?" he hurled at me.

"Dad, I'd rather let 'em land than make the effort to block," I panted

Cubs and Athletics Strong Favorites to Again Cop Major League Races This Year

PIRATES AND GIANTS TO GIVE CHICAGOANS FIGHT

Connie Mack's A's Considered Too Strong for Yanks; Shawkey Has to Rebuild Ruppert Outfit

BY BOB RAY

Although it may be a bit previous to begin thinking much about how the 1930 major league races will end inasmuch as most people haven't yet even given much consideration to their rapidly advancing starts, it is hereby chronicled that already have the Philadelphia Athletics and Chicago Cubs been picked by the experts as the favorites in the coming pennant quests.

This will no doubt be gratifying news to Mr. Connie Mack and Mr. Joseph McCarthy to (know that their outfits have been practically constructed the same as to again romp in the world's series. Then again there is a doubtful quantity. Mr. Mack and Mr. McCarthy will be confronted by the Hot Stove league pickers. Mr. Mack, especially, has since that it is his policy to count the pullets when the hen has been inspired to rear a family, while most likely McCarthy also discovered the fallacy of that policy during his lesser days on the diamond.

However, there's no stopping these baseball critics and quite often their predictions come true.

General impression is that the Athletics, who won the American League pennant with an eighteen-game margin over the Yankees last year, will duplicate the junior circuit. Mack's championship crew is young and figures to be better than ever this season. Connie has a great pitching staff in Lefty Grove, Rube Walberg, George Ernshaw, Howard Ehmke, Ed Rommel and Jack Quinn, who figures to turn in more than enough victories to keep the McGillicuddy standard atop the flag pole.

COCHRANE GOOD AS EVER

The A's catching staff, which is manned mostly of Mickey Cochrane, is just as good as ever. This year, though, Mickey will have the assistance of Wally Schang, veteran receiver, as well as Cy Perkins to help out. Cochrane doesn't need much help but he has plenty of it so Connie will have no worries behind the plate.

Mack's outfield trio of Al Simmons, Mule Haas and Bing Miller will again hold forth so that setup is fast, while the infield figures to be better, if anything. The addition of Jim Keesey, first-sacker from Portland, will enable Connie to shift Jimmy Foxx over to third base should the occasion or injuries demand, while Don McNair, the baby youngster from the Sally League who looked so good during the closing days of the 1929 campaign, threatens to oust the aging Max Bishop from the shortstop position. At any rate, McNair and Foxx will be handy men to have around should any thing happen to the other infielders, who happen to be Max Bishop and Jimmy Dykes.

The Yankees, whose hurling staff flopped so dismally last year, don't appear to have much of a chance to finish ahead of the A's. The Yanks, with Bob Shawkey at the helm, must rebuild their once championship machine and it takes time to rebuild ball clubs so that they produce results in the form of pennants. The Yankee mound staff is going to be an experiment, while the infield is expected to be made over to make room for Lyn Lary and Jimmy Dykes, the ex-Oakland keystone combination. Then there'll be a change in the outfield, where Ruth Manuel will no longer hold down. There is a trio of candidates for the job of playing the outer garden with Ruth and Combs.

The Cleveland Indians might give the A's some trouble, but the Tribe doesn't measure up to the standard of the Mackian machine. The St. Louis Browns haven't strengthened a bit and they finished fourth last year. That eliminates all the 1929 first-division finishers and little sensational opposition is looked for from the Solons, White Sox, Tigers and Red Sox.

In the National League, though, the Cubs figure to have a much tougher battle. The Pittsburgh Pirates and New York Giants have served notice that they're going to take the Cubs for a ride, and maybe one of them can carry out the threat. The Pirates, under Jewel Ens, look like the best bet.

But McCarthy has let no grass grow under his brogans since last fall, and the Cubs also have strengthened. The outstanding Cub acquisition is Lester Bell, who will play third base instead of McMillan. Bell is a better hitter and fielder than McMillan and McCarthy believes he'll return to the form he flashed when the Cards won the National and world series flags of 1926. The Cub pilot also bolstered his highly efficient mound corps by buying a flock of minor-league hurling stars.

Another reason why the Cub rooters feel so confident of their success is because "Gabby" Hartnett's arm has returned to form. Hartnett was out all last year with a lame wing and his absence didn't do the Cubs a bit of good, even though they did win the National flag.

BUC FANS' HOPES HIGH

Pittsburgh supporters, however, claim that only injuries kept them from winning the pennant last season. The Bucs were running neck-and-neck with the Cubs when Burleigh Grimes, their spitball ace, had his pitching hand hit by a batted ball and was forced out. Had Grimes not been injured there's no telling how that National League race might have ended. Swetonic and French, two rookie hurlers last season, figure to be better pitchers this year with a year's experience under their belts. The addition of Gussie Suhr, purchased from the Seals, will add power to the Pirate attack. Suhr ought to hit thirty points better than did Earl Sheely, whom he replaced.

Ens is well-liked by all the players and you can bet on it that Jewel will keep the Pirates hustling every minute of the way. Paul Waner also figures to have a better year at the plate, which is another item to consider. Waner, the leading National League batter in 1928, held on last season and missed out on spring training. His batting suffered as a result and he slumped about thirty-five points under his 1928 average.

Personally, we don't consider the Giants much of a pennant threat, but they might come through and surprise if McGraw can plug up the weakness that showed up at second base last year.

The Cubs, Pirates and Giants are the main flag threats, but Cincinnati, under Darr Howley this season and with some sluggers in its line-up, figures to be a lot tougher. The Cards ought to be just about the same as they were last year, while the Phillies, Robins and Braves will probably consider it a miracle if one of them finished in the first division.

PRONOUNCE IT "EE-DEE"- by Salvador Baguez

Pick-Ups by Bob Ray

A February hunch: Frank Crosetti, the youthful Italian shortstop, will be the outstanding infielder in the Coast League this year. Crosetti batted .314 as lead-off man and fielded spectacularly at shortstop last year although he was at a strange position. Crosetti is bound to improve with a year's experience behind and with Johnny Kerr along side of him at second base, figures to be the class of the circuit's shortstops. Looks like the Seal owners will have to get their famous $50,000 prize tag dusted off and hung on Crosetti for next fall.

Either the owners of the San Francisco Seals are possessed of rare baseball acumen or they're decidedly lucky. Here are some of the athletes whom the Seals have developed and sold to the majors for generous chunks of oughday: Willie Kamm, Jimmy O'Connell, Ike Caveney, Earl Averill, Roy Johnson, Smead Jolley, Paul Waner, Hal Rhyne, Gussie Suhr and Vernon Gomez. And now they have Crosetti coming up for sale next fall. Wotta life those Valencia-street baseball barons do lead.

It seems that several of the Coast League's graduates aren't satisfied with the major league salaries offered them and have sent their contracts back unsigned. Walter Berger, the Angel outfielder, who reports to the Boston Braves, Smead Jolley, who goes to the White Sox, and Jimmy Reese, now a Yankee, are three athletes who feel their new big-league bosses aren't doing right by them in a salaried way.

Speaking of holdouts, the Angels aren't having so much success in getting their athletes signed up for the 1930 campaign. Several contracts have been sent back unsigned.

Visiting Coast League teams will have a new "home" in Los Angeles this season. Arrangements have been made for the invading athletes to stop at the Alexandria Hotel. Fay Smalley, the genial manager of the Alex, has also made arrangements to provide a clubroom for the visiting scribes. The newspaper boys will appreciate that kind of treatment.

Those who have seen George Harper, the new Angel outfielder, in action say that his hitting will make a big hit with Seraph rooters. Harper, who is a left-hand hitter, is a terrific right-field driver and figures to get a lot of homers over the screen at Wrigley Field. In fact some of Harper's supporters assert that he'll be the hardest right-field hitter in the Coast League this year.

Speaking of right-field hitters, Coast League hurlers will breath easier when they visit San Francisco this year now that Jolley and Suhr are not with the Seals. Jolley and Suhr were home-run threats every time they stepped up to the plate and aimed for that short right-field wall at Recreation Park.

Red Killefer evidently isn't the salesman he was when he was part owner of the Seattle Indians. Red sold plenty of athletes to the big leagues when he was heading the Indians but he has tried all winter to peddle Mickey Finn and "Osky" Slade, the Mission keystone combination, to the majors without success. And both Finn and Slade are real big league timber.

While on the subject of sluggers, one and all declare that Jimmy Zinn, the pitcher the Seals recently acquired from Cleveland, is about as sweet a hitter as can be found. Zinn, who bats from the south side of the plate, batted .380 for the Indians last year and is said to be a natural swinger. The Seals plan on revamping him into an outfielder because of his batting ability.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (AP)—Frank Hunter came back to the tennis wars today after four months' rest to score a one-sided victory in the opening round of the national indoor tennis championship.

The 35-year-old New Rochelle (N. Y.) newspaper publisher, who is heavily favored to win the title, steam-rollered E. W. Black, New York youth, at 6-0, 6-2, in a match that lasted less than forty-five minutes.

Although seven pounds over his best playing weight of 178, Hunter, who is ranked second only to Bill Tilden among the country's players, carried far too many guns for his young opponent, and the affair was little more than a workout.

A gallery of about 300 saw all of the leading favorites survive the opening matches of this thirty-first annual indoor event in the Seventh Regiment Armory.

Udo Zaenglein, of Germany, only foreigner among the seventy entries, used an awkward, but effective style to win his first-round encounter from Ed Stillman of New York, 6-3, 5-7, 6-1.

Harris Coggeshall of Des Moines, Iowa, and Harvard, seeded fifth, outclassed Clarence Rose, Jacksonville, Fla., 6-0, 6-1.

J. Gilbert Hall, South Orange, N. J., seeded second only to Hunter, made short work of Clarence Chaffee, Providence R. I., winning at 6-1, 6-4.

Robert D. Little of Tuscaloosa, Ala., reached the second round by defeating Ken Underwood, N. Y., 7-5, 7-5, but James S. Free, also of Tuscaloosa, bowed to S. J. Wadsworth, N. Y., 6-4, 6-3.

Washington's representatives fared similarly, Bob Considine, national public parks doubles champion, trimming John Kirkham, New York, 6-1 6-1, but Dooley Mitchell, another Washingtonian, bowing to Earle Bach, New York, 6-4, 8-6. There were preliminary round matches and Considine later returned to defeat A. L. Bruneau, New York, 4-6, 7-5, 7-5, and reach the second round.

Jerome Polstein, University of Pennsylvania, lost to Merritt Cutler, New York, seeded eighth, 6-1, 3-6, 6-2.

Folger Frost, Morristown, N. J., defeated Charles Baldwin, New York, 6-2, 6-2.

In the tournament are players ranging in age from 18 to 60.

COUNTS ON CUBS AND THE ANGELS

ly connected, conducted in major-league style.

While Mr. Patrick will go into details galore on the spiffy infield the Angels will have with Haney at second, Dittmar at short, Sigafoos at third and possibly a new first baseman; Harper, Moore and Stair with Schulmerich as an alternate in the outfield; Barfoot, Raschi, Horne, Ballou, Delaney, Peters, Gabler and Holling in the pitcher's box; Sandberg and Warren behind the bat with two or three other potential heroes still to be signed, Mr. Wrigley is anxiously counting the days before his Cubs arrive.

Everything is in readiness for the coming of the vanguard. Mr. Wrigley came on from Chicago recently and saw to that personally.

The all-grass diamond at Catalina looks like the well-manicured lawn of some millionaire's country estate.

NEW GOLF COURSE TRICKY

And just a little ways up the canyon the new nine holes of the golf course—grass fairways and grass greens—are nearly ready to be thrown open for play.

Joe Fishel, the home-town pro, has all his old clubs burnished for the occasion, and Clarence in the locker room of the clubhouse is prepared to cater to the wants of tired athletes—athletes who need to be refreshed by hot showers, cold showers, shoe shines and whatnot.

The Catalina Golf Club, where the Cubs will spend many moments, is one of the most unique golf clubs in the world.

Its only member is Mr. William Wrigley, Jr. Green fees are charged the playing public on the golf course, but Mr. Wrigley is the only one who pays dues to the club.

The new nine beggars description. Winding up and around the canyons it is sporty, tricky and seductive.

Many the golf ball that will be lost when some of the wild-swinging baseball athletes start pounding the little white pills down the fairways. Many a shrub-covered hillside will be a nesting place.

But, the bat and ball boys will enjoy it thoroughly and there is enough hill climbing to give every mother's son a real workout.

Of course, some of the boys prefer golf to baseball, and the natives still relate stories of "Speed" Martin, for example, who could easily sprain an ankle and render himself unfit for baseball practice but still crawl up to the links and play a wonderful round of golf.

Mr. Martin is no longer with the Cubs, but there are several of the current team's representatives who might ditch baseball for golf if the eagle eye of Joe McCarthy wasn't kept glued on their activities.

Things are quiet at Catalina now. The big house of the Baron on the hill stands sequestered in bright solitude.

But three weeks from now it will be different. The Baron of the isle will take an even livelier interest in life. He's wrapped up in his Cubs. That fateful seventh inning of the fourth Cub-Athletic game in the world series still brings a chuckle, but no recriminations.

SUN WAS TOO BRIGHT

"They start the games in Philadelphia at 3:30 during the regular season," says the Baron. "The sun isn't so bad then. We opened at 1:30, and when the sun broke through in the seventh inning it is small wonder that Hack Wilson lost a fly in the sun for a home run which counted three runs.

"The tip-off was seen in the case of Art Nehf. He couldn't even see the ball thrown back by the catcher. He had to throw his arms up in front of his face as a guard. The game should have been called for ten minutes.

"But that's another story. We'll get them this year."

TITLE MALLET CLASH ON TAP

comparable Tommy Hitchcock, who was playing with Rancho here last winter. Roark rates at seven goals.

Forrester, the third international star on the Rancho four, won his polo spurs as a member of the Seventeenth Lancers, a crack British army team. He has played here several seasons and always gives a sparkling performance.

It is easy to see that Rancho is well fortified for the mallet battle today. Each of the teams will be on its toes at all times as a defeat means elimination from the tournament. Argentine was supposed to have played San Mateo last Friday, but that game was defaulted so today's tilt is their first in action in the championship.

Midwick Country Club's big four led by Carleton Burke, who advanced a step by a victory over Cypress Point, are scheduled to lock horns Wednesday with Laddie Sanford's Hurricanes. The final game of the championship will be staged next Sunday by the two surviving teams in the championship play.

ROOKIE HONORS FOR FREDERICK

Johnny Has Brilliant First Year at Brooklyn

Former Hollywooder Clouts New Double Record

Fleet Flychaser Wins Over Fans of Flatbrush

BROOKLYN, Feb. 1.—Who was the prize rookie of last season's baseball competition? Students of the game will differ in their answers to this query according to their varying opinions, angles, partnerships and associations with the game and its players. No doubt the American League partisans will claim the honor for either Ferrell or Averill. The Red fans will claim it for Swanson or Sukforth, and the Pittsburgh fans for Dick Bartell. Bill Walker of the Giants was a wizard on the hill last year and led the pitchers in effectiveness.

But taking the stodgy through, blustery spring days, the dog days of August and the days of the falling leaf in September, no one has anything on Johnny Frederick, the fleet, hard-hitting, steady, modest center-fielder of the Brooklyn Robins.

SET TWO-BASE-HIT MARK

Not only did Frederick break a league record with fifty-two doubles last year, his first in the big league, but he batted .328 in 148 games, made twenty-four home runs and was regarded as one of the best fielders in baseball now that Edd Roush's legs are not what they used to be.

No matter who picks his prize rookie of last year he is sure to name Frederick as either first, second or third choice. He cannot do otherwise and still be judged by the records of the year and by fair and competent judgment.

John Henry Frederick hails from Portland, Or., and in his high-school days out there he had trouble making the team because he was so small and frail. "I was only 17 when I went to Regina to play professional ball and weighed only 130 pounds," said Johnny with a smile. "They said I was a star there but I do not know why, for I batted only .336."

It was doubtless his speed and skill as a fielder and his natural ability in every department of play that attracted the Coast critics, for Frederick was offered a job by Vernon and Salt Lake City. He finally went with Salt Lake City, moved with the Bees to Hollywood and played there two years before going to Memphis in 1928. He hit .349 for Memphis that season and Nap Rucker scouted him for the Robins.

STARTED POORLY

When Frederick started with the Robins last spring he got off badly. He was nervous, tried too hard and his hitting was nothing to send word back to Memphis or Portland about. But the boy was game to his heart throbs and he had sound sense. Gradually he found himself and began to hit! Lithe as a leopard, covering acres of ground between the erratic Herman and the glowing Bressler in the outfield, Frederick had won the Flatbush fans before midsummer. And then he went right on compiling that classical record of fifty-two doubles and twenty-four home runs and that .328 batting average. He has no bad habits, is smart and ambitious and he should be a shining star of the majors next year.

CAMPOLO WILL TAKE ON RISKO

and then repeated the action Friday—Madison Square Garden still insists that it will stage that match. All that remains now is a conference or two before announcement is made that Campolo and Risko will battle in the semifinal to the Jack Sharkey-Phil Scott extravaganza at Miami the 27th inst.

Risko's agreement to this arrangement was received at the Garden today. Campolo, who has no official manager now aside from his brother, Phillipe, cannot be spoken for officially until Frank Bruen, head man for the Garden in promotion of the Florida party, arrives here tomorrow. There is little question that the bout will be arranged, if only to give silent vent to the Garden's outraged feelings.

The signing of Risko and Campolo will complete the major card for the second annual Garden series in the Southland. Tommy Loughran and Pierre Charles of Belgium will collide in the opening ten-rounder. Negotiations to match Paulino and Jimmy Maloney in the semifinal have been dropped.

No action is expected from the New York commission if the Garden insists on staging the Risko-Campolo match somewhere else. The commission's objection that Risko "is to small," not generally agreed with by experts who saw plump Johnny whip George Godfrey, Phil Scott, Jimmy Maloney and Jack Sharkey, are not expected to create opposition among the Florida solons.

DAN O'LEARY WALKS AT BELL GAME TODAY

Dan O'Leary, 90-year-old walker, will put on his usual exhibition this afternoon at the town of Bell, when he walks six times around the bases in five minutes for the edification of fans attending the game between the Bell Merchants and their foes.

Dan is now approaching his ninety-first birthday, but declares he gets younger every day. His next birthday is in June.

LAST NET CONTESTS SCHEDULED

Final Matches Arranged for "Century Doubles" on Club Courts

The "Century Doubles" tournament at the Los Angeles Tennis Club will come to a close this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock when finals in the event will be staged. The semifinal matches are scheduled in the morning at 10:30.

William M. Henry donated to the club a trophy upon retiring from office last Sunday evening as president of the L.A.T.C. The only qualification for entry in the event was a combined total age of 100 years between the two partners.

Many old-time veterans and stars competed in the preliminary play last Sunday in which the field narrowed down to four surviving combinations. These four teams clash this morning to settle who shall be the finalists to decide the winner.

Thomas Bundy, the former world's and national champion, and Simpson Shabaugh, president of the Southland net body, have been established as favorites to cop the title. They meet Cunningham and Bobson in one tilt, while De Mille and Overton cross rackets with Church and Thomasin in the lower half.

MIANNE PALFREY IN BROOKLINE NET WIN

BROOKLINE (Mass.) Feb. 1. (AP)—Mianne Palfrey, 18, today became the women's national indoor singles tennis champion by defeating Mrs. John B. Jessup of Wilmington, Del., 7-5, 6-2, in the finals on the Longwood indoor courts. Mrs. Jessup was indoor champion in 1934 and 1935.

Mrs. George Wightman and Sarah Palfrey, Mianne's sister, retained their national doubles championship by conquering Edith Sigourney of Boston and Marjorie Morrill, Dedham, 6-3, 6-2.

BY TONY LAZZERI
As told to John F. McCann

(Copyright, 1930, by North American Newspaper Alliance.)

To say that even as far back as 1921, when as a youngster I was playing semi-pro ball, I did not have the idea of some day reaching the big leagues would be folly, as all young players, I think, hope for a place in the highest spot in baseball.

As a member of the Golden Gate Natives' team, playing in the Winter League in San Francisco, I started the long, long trail, the end of which was eventually to bring me into the American League as a member of the great Yankee team, which the late Miller Huggins welded into such a powerful baseball aggregation.

The first chance for advancement came as the result of leading the Natives' club in batting that winter and, as a result, it opened the way for a trial with the Salt Lake team in the Pacific Coast League, but before I finally made good with them, I spent several years in the smaller leagues, including stops at Peoria and Lincoln. Then, in 1925, with Salt Lake at last, I began knocking at the major league landing.

Smashing sixty home runs out of the Pacific Coast League parks that summer and driving over the plate 222 runs, brought Jim Harrington, scout of the New York Yankees, scurrying into the far northwest to see what it was all about, and it was Harrington who bought me and carried out the negotiations that brought me under the direction of Miller Huggins, that grand little baseball general who recently passed into the great beyond.

There is only one road to the big league and only one way, and that is through hustling and plugging without a single moment's let-up. But once you have reached the majors, what does it mean? Easy sailing? It means hustling and plugging even more than ever before.

PARAGRAPHS from a Baseball Statistician's SCRAP BOOK by Leo Moriarty

The longest Coast League baseball game played in Los Angeles occurred in the opening week of the 1911 season, when Seattle and Los Angeles battled twenty-seven innings. The score was 0 to 0 and it is safe to have established a record for length, as not two errors were chalked up in the long game. Howard Ehmke was at the box for Los Angeles and Lewis was the receiver for Hatten and Mitze.

Vitze and Gorchakof were the battery for Seattle, while Miller and Mitze, Pott and Rauscher were partners. West and Mitze, Reed, Caslin and Mitze, Hatten and Ford were partners. Manning and Ford caught Lazet.

Brilliant Field Enters Annual Los Angeles Midwinter Women's Championsh

MRS. PRESSLER FAVORED TO ANNEX THIRD CROWN

Eastern, Canadian Stars Included in Record-Breaking Entry List; Qualifying Play Tomorrow

BY EDWARD LAWRENCE

Grooving their swings for the national women's championship, women golfers of Southern California are missing no opportunities to engage in tournament competition these days.

As a result, the annual midwinter championship, which starts over the south course of the Los Angeles Country Club tomorrow with an eighteen hole qualifying test, has attracted a field unsurpassed in brilliance. There are ninety-six entries.

MISS KATHLEEN WRIGHT

Headed by Mrs. Leona Pressler of the San Gabriel Country Club, considered the foremost threat for Miss Glenna Collett's national title in the fall, the field will include every well-known woman golfer in the Southland, and a few from the East, Northwest and Canada.

Mrs. Edward F. Lenihan, nee Kathleen Wright, 1929 mid winter champion, will be the only missing star.

Mrs. Vera Hutchings of Canada, winner of the first midwinter championship held in 1924, is spending the winter in Southern California, and will attempt to win the title again. Mrs. Hutchings defeated Miss Margaret Cameron of Flintridge in the finals.

Mary K. Browne, whose recent reinstatement was joyously received by her many friends, was the winner in 1925.

In 1926, Miss Cameron defeated Mrs. George M. Lewis of Los Angeles in the finals to win that year.

Mrs. Pressler held the title in 1927, and again in 1928, defeating Miss Cameron the first year and Miss Marjorie Kirkham the second time. Mrs. Pressler did not defend the title in 1929.

Last year's championship was one of the most exciting ever played, and saw Miss Wright annex her first major title by defeating Mrs. Gregg Lifur of Riviera, former California State and Southern California woman's champion, in a pulse-quickening match.

Mrs. Lifur, who was been Mrs. Pressler's chief rival for a number of years, is expected to furnish the principal opposition. Mrs. Lifur's record in the East last summer and fall was second only to that of the San Gabriel star. She advanced to the finals of the western women's championship, losing the championship in a match that went extra holes.

Among the favorites will be Mrs. Roy Green of the California Country Club, Los Angeles city women's champion; Miss Beatrice Gotlieb, two handicap star from the Metropolitan district of New York; Miss Helen Lawson of Wilshire; Mrs. Marlow Higbie, leading eastern star, and Mrs. Harry Grossman of Hillcrest, former Los Angeles city champion.

Other well-known women players who have entered, according to Mrs. George M. Midgley, president of the women's auxiliary, are Mrs. J. C. Woerner of Los Angeles, Mrs. Bess Edwards of California, Mrs. R. E. Elliott of Brentwood, Mrs. C. W. Fellows of California, and others.

There is also a possibility that Miss Lucille DeLong, brilliant young San Diego star, may play. Miss DeLong is planning to get up on her game for the national championship, and would be a welcome addition to the field.

Those who qualify for the championship flight will play over the north course, while other flights are scheduled over the south course.

Match play is set for Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. There will be defeated eights in each flight.

A Calcutta dinner is planned tomorrow evening at 6:30.

BRILLIANTS O' LINKS SHINE IN MIDWINTER CHAMPIONSHIP

Here are five favorites in the annual invitation tournament to be played over the Los Angeles Country Club courses next week. Mrs. Gregg Lifur, runner-up to Miss Kathleen Wright last year, is expected to be a real threat, second only to Mrs. Leona Pressler, twice midwinter champion. Mrs. Mark Steele of San Gabriel and Mrs. Harry Grossman of Hillcrest are two of the most consistent women players in the Southland. A rising star, Mrs. Roy Green of the California Country Club, holds the Los Angeles city women's championship, and is regarded as a real comer. The eighteen-hole qualifying round will be played tomorrow over the south course. Championship flight matches are scheduled over the north course, while all other matches will be played over the south course.

SHUTE JUST MISSED FAME

Fifteen-foot Putt Jumped Out of Cup to Rob Him of Tying Bobby Jones and Al Espinosa in National Open Championship at Winged Foot

BY SOL METZGER

"Shute, Densmore—The tiniest bit of a break, and the young Columbus (O.) professional might have been the 1929 national open champion. A corner if there ever was one. Shute finished two strokes back of Al Espinosa and Bobby Jones at Winged Foot with cards of 73-71-76-76—296."

A California periodical carried this short pen sketch of elongated and slim Denny Shute in its issue published on the eve of the recent $10,000 Los Angeles open. Shute won the event with another medal of 286 strokes and with it a cash prize of $3500. His competitors were as fast a field of pros as the country offers in any open event.

"The tiniest bit of a break" caught my attention, for I recall an incident in the last open championship at Winged Foot that few saw.

Bobby Jones had just rammed home his last long twelve-foot putt to tie Al Espinosa and everyone had settled down for an extra day of walking with a big gallery. Then I heard some one remark: "Just heard that a fellow named Shute still has a chance." No one knew who he was or at just what part of the course he might be found.

So we started off to cover it in reverse and came upon Shute as he prepared to play a long iron second to the seventeenth green. From one of the half-dozen people in the gallery with him we learned that Shute needed a birdie and a par on the last two holes to tie Jones and Espinosa and thus force a play-off.

Shute used an iron for his second and played it with due regard for the drift of the green from left to right on this 450-yarder. His distance was perfect, but his ball failed to come in as much as was to be expected. Still he was left with a fifteen-foot putt, a putt that meant everything in the golf world to him. A birdie here spelled almost a certain tie, for the eighteenth on that sun-baked course was not hard to reach with a second.

Denny was not a bit flustered by the situation he was in. He took his time over his putt, studied it from off both ends of the imaginary line and then calmly stroked it along the chosen route. It was a magnificent effort. His ball came straight for the cup. But it didn't stay in. Like far too many perfectly played putts it skidded around the far edge of the cup and came plopping up on its near side to the very brink of the hole.

What a heart breaker it was. Shute had played three well-nigh perfect shots from tee to pin only to have his ball do tricks with him just as it seemed his cause was won. Shute tapped it in for a par 4 and went on about his business of taking third-place money without comment on his bad luck. Since which we have been keeping an eagle eye peeled his way, for we, too, came to the conclusion after his calmness at Winged Foot under fire that here was a "comer" who but needed "the tiniest bit of a break" to come through in a great golf event. Keep your eyes on Denny Shute from now on, folks. He's a grand young golfer and a mighty dangerous player now that he has broken through in a big event.

MIDWICK SCHEDULES ANNUAL SOUTHLAND SENIOR TOURNEY

Southern California's annual senior championship, "silver putter tournament," will be played over the Midwick Country Club's course on Monday and Tuesday, the 24th and 25th inst. The tournament is open to any golfer of 50 years or over who is a member of a golf club affiliated with the United States Golf Association. As usual, the field will be divided into four groups, Class A, 50 to 55 years; Class B, 55 to 60 years; Class C, 60 to 65 years; and Class D, 65 years and over. The Edward S. Hunter perpetual trophy, which goes to the club of the senior champion, is held by the Fox Hills Country Club. The champion is E. V. Weakley. A number of trophies will be awarded, the chief award being the "silver putter," which goes to the player having the best medal for thirty-six holes. Prizes will be awarded in each class to the player who is least down to par, without handicap, and one for the player who is least down to par with his handicap for the thirty-six holes. There will also be a trophy for the player having the fewest number of putts for the thirty-six holes. Play will be in four-ball, or two-ball matches, either morning or afternoon. Eighteen holes are scheduled each day.

HAGEN SAILS FOR HAWAII

"The Haig," Kirkwood Off on First Leg of Four Months' Exhibition Tour of Antipodes

Walter Hagen, British open champion, sailed with Joe Kirkwood on the Lasco liner City of Honolulu yesterday for an extended exhibition tour of Hawaii, Australia, and the Orient. The two noted golfers will be gone four months, returning to Seattle on May 30.

Unless Hagen changes his plans in the meantime, his schedule will not permit him to play in the British open championship, and in all probability the four times' winner and defending champion of the English classic will not match strokes with Bobby Jones for that title.

WALTER HAGEN

Hagen is scheduled to arrive in Honolulu on the 7th inst. and will remain five days in Hawaii. This will be followed by twelve days on the water with Auckland, N. Z., next on the program. Wellington will also be taken in.

From Brisbane, Hagen will sail for Manila. Exhibitions will then be played at Hongkong, Shanghai, Kobe and Yokohama.

Australian stops will include Sydney and Brisbane with practically the entire month of March spent in these two cities.

Kirkwood, an Aussie, is extremely popular in Australia, and Hagen is something of a national hero.

Should the oriental part of the trip fall through, there is an excellent possibility that "The Haig" may decide to take in the British open and sail westward instead of eastward to Seattle as planned.

Cheney Wins Tin Whistle Tournament

L. D. Cheney won the "tin whistle" tournament played at the San Gabriel Country Club yesterday. He carded 79-7-72 for 19 points. R. D. Schmets, 78-7-71, 18 points, and E. E. Aborgast, 78-7-71, 18 points, tied for second place.

J. S. Piper was the winner in Class B, 96-24-72, 20 points. Frank Parker, 90-18-72, 19 points, and W. P. Battelle, 90-18-72, 19 points, tied for second prize.

"NIBS" PRICE TO BRING GOLF CLUBS NEXT TIME

"Nibs" Price, University of California basketball coach, will bring his golf clubs south next week when he brings the Bear casaba tossers to Los Angeles for a two-game series with the U.C.L.A. Bruins.

Price was anxious to settle an argument with Howard Jones, U.S.C. football coach, on the Huks, over the past week-end, but was unable to play due to the fact that his wife was ill.

Price is one of the leading golfers around the Berkeley district, while Jones, having twice defeated Aubrey Devine, U.S.C. frosh coach, now holds the Trojan golf championship.

"Mac" Smith Starts Home in Few Days

Macdonald Smith, who has been enjoying himself under Southern California's sunshiny skies for the past three weeks, plans to leave for New York either on Wednesday or Thursday. "Mac" plans to tend to a bit of business in Gotham before going South to Pinehurst for the annual North and South open championship. "Mac" has been a frequent visitor to Midwick, and on Tuesday plans to play a final round with Fred Morrison at El Caballero.

RED HILL WINS INITIAL MATCH

Defeats San Bernardino in Hard-Fought Clash, 7-2

In a match that was much closer than the score would indicate golfers of the Red Hill Country Club opened their 1930 interclub team-match season yesterday by defeating San Bernardino, 7 to 2.

San Bernardino, the latest addition to the league, put up a stiff battle, and carried the first two matches to extra holes.

Individual results were as follows:

Peter South and Leo Blackmer (R.H.) defeated W. W. Savage and D. Knapp (S.B.) 1 up, 19 holes.
J. Taylor and F. Trautman (R.H.) defeated C. O. Johnson and J. Sheldon (S.B.) up, 20 holes.
W. Kinkaid and Pops Adams (R.H.) defeated E. Pollock and J. O'Conner (S.B.) 2 and 1.
O. Hanson and A. Kimlock (S.B.) defeated J. Massett and J. H. Black (R.H.) 3 and 2.
F. J. Teber and H. Jumper (R.H.) defeated J. Claymont and V. M. McCloskey (S.B.) 7 and 6.
M. C. Bacus and A. R. Gensel (R.H.) defeated A. Camphouse and R. Carson (S.B.) 3 and 2.
D. H. Savage and B. Allen (S.B.) defeated C. E. Neil and W. H. Andrews (R.H.) 3 up.

CLAWSON BAGS 68 AT SUNSET FIELDS

M. V. Clawson, assistant pro at Sunset Fields, failed to qualify for the final two days of play at Agua Caliente, but celebrated his return home by shooting a 68.

TAVERNER, REYNOLDS TIE

Ralph Reynolds and W. E. (Bill) Taverner tied for first place in the medal sweepstakes played over the Flintridge Country Club course yesterday. Play was at full handicap, and both registered 76-6-70. E. B. (Bud) Yonkum, 75-4-71, and N. T. Mears, 77-6-71, tied for second place.

MIDWICK ACCEPTS TOURNEY

Southern California Amateur Championship to be Held Over Monterey Park Course in May

The Midwick Country Club yesterday officially accepted the Southern California amateur championship.

This announcement came from Emerson Spear, prominent member of the Midwick Country Club board of directors.

The tournament will be held the week of May 19 to 25.

EMERSON SPEAR.

Midwick, one of the finest tests of golf in Southern California, has been sought for several tournaments, principally the Los Angeles $10,000 open, but was unable to accept as winter play is heavy over the Monterey Park course and the club did not wish to prevent its members from playing, even for a short time.

Play is not so heavy in May, however, and Midwick readily accepted the Southland's premier amateur event.

The tournament was played last year over the Bel-Air Country Club course and the year before at Lakeside.

Gibson Dunlap, 21-year-old University of California at Los Angeles golfer, will be the defending champion. Dunlap defeated David Martin of California in the final match last year.

Pan-American Title Annexed by Lamprecht

EDGEWATER PARK (Miss.) Feb 1. (AP)—G. Fred Lamprecht of New Orleans today won the Pan-American amateur golf championship by defeating Jack Westland of Chicago, French amateur champion, 2 up, after a battle to the last hole of the final thirty-six.

LONG BEACH WINS INTERCLUB MATCH

The Long Beach Country Club team defeated Palos Verdes, 5 to 1, in a match played yesterday. The match was scheduled for today, but the Palos Verdes golfers requested that the date be changed.

PARAMOUNT GOLFERS STAGE TOURNEY

Golfers of the Paramount studios will hold a tournament over the No. 2 course at Sunset Fields today.

BRAWLEY GOLFERS HOLD ANNUAL CHAMPIONSHIP

Brawley's second annual lettuce and cantaloupe growers' and shippers' tournament, scheduled to start on the 12th inst., has the Imperial Valley golfing fraternity busy polishing up their niblics.

The tournament will be played over the Del Rio Country Club, an interesting course 119 feet below sea level. Brawley golfers have put much time and effort into their course, which boasts grass fairways, and in time will have grass greens. The sand greens in use now are excellent putting surfaces, however, and do very well.

Money for trophies was raised by the sale of several carloads of lettuce, almost $3000 being spent for prizes.

Hundreds of carloads of lettuce and melons are shipped out of Brawley every year, and practically all of the railroads in the country carry a portion of Brawley's output. At the present time a number of railroad presidents are on a tour of inspection and a special flight will be made up entirely of the visiting railroad potentates, who will stop at Brawley.

Fay Coleman, Los Angeles city champion, will be the guest of Elmer Sears, tournament chairman, and other Del Rio officials today and tomorrow when a tournament will be staged preliminary to the invitational.

MEXICAN GOLF FANS TO SEE DUDLEY, SMITH EXHIBITION

Horton Smith, America's leading tournament winner for the 1929-30 season, will leave San Antonio during the next few days for a series of exhibition matches in Mexico City on the 7th and 8th insts. Smith will be accompanied by Ed Dudley, who was a member of America's Ryder Cup team with Smith last spring.

HORTON SMITH

ED DUDLEY

Bob Harlow, manager for both Walter Hagen and Smith, announced at Agua Caliente that Horton had been offered a $1000 guarantee and the gross receipts for the Mexican exhibitions. Smith and Dudley will be paired with prominent professionals of Mexico. The exhibitions are being sponsored by the Mexican Golf Association, which is headed by Harry Wright.

Five leagues, numbering nine clubs, make their debut in Southern California's interclub ... matches today.

In important matches, Glendale, rated as one of the strongest clubs in the Southland, meets Oakmont on the latter's course; Riviera travels to Fox Hills to test the strength of the Culver City team, also rated as a potential champion; Virginia, in the same league with Fox Hills and Riviera, makes the longest jaunt of the day, to San Diego.

Interest in today's matches, however, is secondary to the interest being shown in Wednesday's matches, which bring together the two strongest leagues into competition.

Matches scheduled for Wednesday are as follows:

GROUP NO. 2

Midwick (5) at San Gabriel (2.)
Lakeside (7) at Bel-Air (0.)

GROUP NO. 6

Rancho (7) at Brentwood (0.)
Hollywood (5) at California (2.)

GROUP NO. 7

Los Angeles (9) at Whittier (0.)
Flintridge (9) at Annandale (0.)

Competition will be brisk in the seventh division, where Los Angeles, defending interclub champion, and Flintridge, 1929 runner-up, are engaged in a desperate struggle for group honors.

Rancho, easily the strongest team in the league with George Kerr at the helm, is expected to top those of Brentwood with ease, although the Santa Monica club may decide otherwise. California Club will gain a bit at Hollywood's expense.

Final matches are to be played on March 5 and 9, at which time the schedule of play-off events will start.

Midwick got off to a flying start last Wednesday, and is now leading in Group No. 2. The Monterey Park team from San Gabriel this week. The Midwick Club won only 2 points from Lakeside last week, and Midwick has a fine opportunity of increasing its lead over the North Hollywood club.

Fred Morrison reported yesterday that he has a strong Midwick team lined up for the San Gabriel matches, and Midwick players are enthusiastic over their prospects.

Affairs of the Week
by Juana Neal Levy

January . . . the month of entertaining, for of all the year there is no month which has as many holidays, at least celebrating as many future anniversaries as February.

Aside from birthday, St. Valentine's affair scheduled and many of them three or four, including breakfast, luncheon tea, dinner and theater parties.

Washington's birthday all ... is the month and all of them ... celebrated throughout the country with many festivities, many of ... are affairs, but all of them ... prominence in the social calendar.

... has rather impressed with ... social affairs of this ... for almost every day of this ... eight has some lovely ...

Last evening one of the outstanding affairs of the whole winter was given, sponsored by the Assistance League, when Nine O'clock Players gave a series of divertisements, at the Windsor Square Theater, preceded by many lovely dinner parties at the league tea rooms in De Longpre Boulevard, Hollywood, where a fashion show of lingerie from its shops was charmingly presented by Miss Elsy Jane Myrick, Miss Daisy Parsons and Miss Frances Alexander.

Thursday evening the Pasadena Junior League will give its annual Frolic, taking the form of a premiere movie-talkie at the Warner Brothers' Theater in Hollywood, and followed by supper and entertainment at the Embassy Club and Montmartre adjoining. This is a new diversion and promises to be a great success, as the movie-talkie will not be shown otherwise for many months and the star is one of the most popular actors of the screen and stage this particular vehicle is one which has been much and widely discussed and its release eagerly looked forward to.

The Pasadena Junior League is unique in its motif of entertaining, each previous year having a cabaret supper-dance, which hitherto has been given at the Biltmore, when the members of the league have provided the personnel of the program and they have attracted much favorable criticism for the presentations.

Interesting to members and friends of the league will be to note that Miss Averic Allen, former president of the Pasadena chapter, has just returned from the regional conference in Seattle, where she was unanimously elected regional director, having charge of the western coast, which includes all the chapters from Pasadena and Los Angeles as far north as Portland and Seattle and extending to Honolulu.

She will attend the national conferences, representing the chapters of her region, presenting all their problems and helping to straighten them out.

A new chapter was also voted in to be formed in Mexico City, and Miss Allen will also include this in her regional direction.

Another interesting event of Thursday will be the benefit bridge-tea which is being sponsored by the Shakespeare Foundation of California and is being given at 2:15 p.m. at Vista Del Arroyo in Pasadena. Tea will be served at 4:30 o'clock. More than seventy-five tables have been reserved and there will be eight exquisite door prizes and an oil by James Merrian, obtained through the courtesy of Mrs. William Henry Anderson.

Mrs. R. D. Shepherd is chairman of the afternoon, patrons including William Andrews Clark, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Avery McCarthy, Judge and Mrs. Ruas Avery, Dr. and Mrs. Walter Jarvis Barlow, Mrs. Robert Jones Burdette, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Travers Clover, Judge and Mrs. Benjamin F. Bledsoe, George I. Cochran, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Honnold, Mr. and Mrs. Ben R. Meyer, Mrs. Carl Blissett Fix, Mrs. E. J. Benedict, Mrs. Lewis W. Andrews, Mrs. Charles H. Thompson, Mrs. Oscar A. Trippet, Mrs. Joseph Scott, Mrs. Harry Gray, Mr. and Mrs. Walter R. Simons, Mrs. Bertram Stevens, Mrs. L. L. Storrow, Mrs. Gurdon W. Wattles and Mrs. Genevieve Gray.

Assisting Mrs. Shepherd will be Mrs. Benjamin Givens, Mrs. R. L. Gifford, Mrs. Sloan-Orcutt, Mrs. William H. Anderson, Mrs. Edward A. Dickson, Mrs. John Bullock, Mrs. Willoughby Rodman, Mrs. George Leslie Smith, Mrs. Mark Lewis, Mrs. Frank Davey, Mrs. Georgia Keating Kennedy and Miss Cornelia McLoughlin, Mrs. Giles Hall is chairman of prizes.

Activities in school and college life also are to the fore of the social stage this month.

Tomorrow afternoon there is to be the annual benefit fund concert given as a memorial to the late Mrs. George Caswell, founder of Marlborough School. It will take place at 2:30 o'cock in Caswell Hall, under the auspices of the Alumnae Council, with Mrs. Edward T. Dillon in charge, assisted by Mrs. Eugene Overton, Mrs. Harold Smith, Miss Jean Stewart and Miss Mary Jane Kahler, officers of Marlborough Club; Mrs. John Cobb MacFarland, Miss Georgie Louise Ridge, Mrs. Thomas Caldwell Ridgway, Mrs. Edward A. C. Hammond, Miss Lillian Van Dyke, Mrs. Henry Melvin Young and Mrs. Archibald MacLeish, hostesses.

Following the program, which is to be given by Olga Steeb, Ilya Bronson and David Crocov, there will be an alumnae meeting and tea will be served.

Marlborough is exceedingly busy in its many activities, and among the officers of the senior class are Miss Betty Mae Philip, attractive subdeb, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Philip of 676 South Hobart Boulevard, who has returned recently from a trip to Castle Hot Springs, where she enjoyed a delightful outing. Miss Philip is president of the senior class while Miss Virginia Held, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Tom Held of Beverly Hills, is vice-president; Miss Betty Bancroft, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. R. I. Boncroft of 711 South Harvard Boulevard, is the secretary, and Miss Betty Lee Brady, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas C. Brady of 749 South Longwood avenue is the treasurer of the class. All of these officers were active in assisting Miss Blake, when she gave the carnival at which all the parents as well as the students were bidden.

Hollywood School for Girls has also a most attractive personnel in its graduating class for next June, of which Miss Ruth Russell, daughter of Mrs. Helen G. Russell of 2106 Highland avenue is president. The president of the senior class at Westlake School for Girls is Miss Mary Fanning, attractive daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lois M. Fanning

GUEST AT HOTEL DINNER PARTY

Husband Gives Science Building

[Ray Huff-Richter studios]
Mrs. B. A. Eckhart

MRS. B. A. ECKHART of Chicago, who is passing the winter in Southern California as guest at Hotel Huntington, in Pasadena, was one of the distinguished guests at the dinner given the 23rd inst. at the opening of the hotel given by Dr. and Mrs. John Willis Baer. Mr. Eckhart recently gave a $1,000,000 science building at University of Chicago which, when completed in May, will be christened the Bernard Eckhart Hall.

The opening had more than 600 guests of prominence in Pasadena and near-by cities and was also well represented by many guests from the East, North and South, an Italian fiesta motif being used in decorations and appointments and following the dinner there was a special entertainment and dance in the ballroom.

Affairs of the Week of New York City, who, by the way, is specializing in romantic languages and is planning to enter Columbia University in New York next fall.

For Visitor

One of the lovely affairs of the coming week will be the tea with which Mrs. Donald Whittier (Violet Andrews) and her sister, Miss Ellen Andrews, are entertaining Friday afternoon at the home of their parents, 274 Lafayette Park Place, honoring Mrs. Paul Hoffman, who is arriving tomorrow with Mr. Hoffman from their home in South Bend, Ind., for a visit here, coming to the Southland to attend the wedding of the latter's sister, Miss Virginia Hoffman, Tuesday, in Pasadena.

Although Mr. and Mrs. Hoffman plan to remain but for a brief time, there will be much entertaining in their honor. Saturday evening, Mr. and Mrs. Warren Bradley Boyard and Miss Andrews will give a dinner at the Boyard home, while Friday evening Mr. and Mrs. Paul Helms are giving a dinner for them at their Beverly Hills home and Thursday afternoon a tea at which Mrs. Hoffman will be especial guest of honor.

Miss Andrews is giving a series of teas this season, the one Friday being the first for several months.

Dinner Bridge

Mrs. Elizabeth Burge was the hostess last Monday at a charming dinner and bridge given in the Pompeian Room of the Arcady, where she makes her home. The affair was given in honor of Mrs. Randolph W. Hill, who left Friday for an eight months tour of Europe.

The long table was exquisitely decorated with a beautiful center piece of pink roses. Attractive cards marked the covers for Mr. and Mrs. Herbert T. Powell, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur E. Huntington, Mr. and Mrs. M. S. Burlingame, Mr. and Mrs. Richard F. Barnett, Dr. and Mrs. Lincoln D. Godshal, Dr. and Mrs. J. Arthur Foster, Dr. and Mrs. Cecil R. Luton, Mr. and Mrs. Patrick C. Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. James Campbell, Mrs. Nichols Millbank and Mrs. Mary C. Shaw.

Trip Planned

Miss Alice Tanner of 320 South Lorraine Boulevard, left Friday by airplane for Tahoe to attend the winter sports and races, registering at the Tavern, which opened for the winter yesterday. Miss Tanner was accompanied by Miss Gladys Comstock of Vista del Arroyo, Pasadena.

Dinner Party

Among the charmingly appointed events of the past week was the dinner party with which Miss Constance Deighton - Simpson entertained at the Writer's Club enjoying the one-act plays afterward.

Her guests included Mr. and Mrs. Ned Harrison Leavitt, Miss Rowena Thom, Miss Elisabeth Herron, Miss Alexandra Oddie, Richard Woods, Wheeler Chase, Harold Von Rolf and Leslie McFadden.

At Hotel Del Coronado

Many events of interest filled the week at Hotel Del Coronado beginning with an impromptu game of keno Monday afternoon, and the women's golf tournament held the interest for several days. A big ball, "The Ghost Dance," featured the festivities last evening, carried out in black and white, was most effective in the spacious ballroom and lounge, the entire side walls masked in black and white while hundreds of lanterns encased in the same tones, and decorated with tiny skeletons, shed a fantastic light throughout the room, revealing the orchestra playing in a graveyard, half screened by tombstones. A surprise feature at midnight came when hundreds of white balloons, decorated with tiny black skeletons, were released from the big centerpiece below the dome and many of the dancers wore costumes in the same motif.

Many dinner parties were given before the ball and throughout the week. One of the many dinners of the week was given by officers of the U.S.S. Cuyama in honor of Capt. Earl Shipp, who is in command of the Cuyama, and Mrs. Shipp. The company included Lieutenant-Commander Philip Van Horn Weems and Mrs. Weems, Lieutenant - Commander Samuel Dunham and Mrs. Dunham, Lieutenant and Mrs. Flanagan, Lieutenant and Mrs. Almon, Mrs. Turner Glasscock and Lieut Fried. A few evenings later the officers of the Cuyama, together with their wives, were bidden by Capt. and Mrs. Shipp to a dinner given in their home as a farewell before the departure of the fleet, as the Cuyama will sail in advance of the other ships.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Henderson Farnsworth gave a dinner for their son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Earle Farnsworth. Mr. and Mrs. Rollin H. Scribner entertained for their daughter, Mrs. John Francis Feeney. Miss Nell Logan's guests included Mr. and Mrs. William Walbridge, Miss Sarah Libby and Mrs. Charles Ashley. Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Porter entertained for Mrs. Alvin B. Daniels.

Benefit Semiformal

Two hundred and fifty invitations have been issued for a semiformal benefit dance to be given Saturday evening, the 8th inst., by Gamma chapter of the Beta Delta Gamma Sorority. The affair will take place at the Beverly Hills Woman's Club in Benedict Canyon Drive, with a dancing contest as one of the attractive features.

Statesman's Son Here

Lavish preparations are being made in Hollywood for the entertainment of Alistar MacDonald, eldest son of the British Prime Minister, J. Ramsay MacDonald, who arrived in Los Angeles during the week, and is making his headquarters at the Hollywood Roosevelt.

Mr. MacDonald is enjoying his first visit to this section of the country, and during his stay he will be honored by many of the city's social leaders.

Churchill-Knourek

The marriage of Miss Maybelle Churchill, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Churchill of 1943 West Forty-third Place, to James Knourek of 937 West Fifty-fifth street, was solemnized January 24, in the Wee Kirk o' the Heather, by Rev. James Whitcomb Brougher, Jr. After a trip to Agua Caliente, Mr. and Mrs. Knourek are now making their home in Los Angeles.

Birthday Party-Dance

One of the delightful events of the week was the birthday party and dance given last Friday at the Black-Foxe Military Institute in honor of Cadet Edward Bradford and Cadet Morris Plotkin, the anniversaries of whose births fall on the same day.

A military motif was carried out in the decorations, with the school's colors, black and gold, forming the keynote. A large birthday cake, surmounted by the appropriate number of candles, was a feature of the party. Guests were cadets of the institute and their friends. Patrons and patronesses were Maj. and Mrs. Earle Foxe, Maj. and Mrs. Harry Black, Maj. and Mrs. Davis W. Hale and Maj. Harry Gaver.

For Newlyweds

Mr. and Mrs. George J. Wilson of Monte-Mar Vista were dinner hosts of last evening in their home, complimenting three young bridal couples, Mr. and Mrs. Warren Lamb (Lucille Mead.) Lieut. and Mrs. John Drake Shaw (Evelyn Platt.) and Lieut. and Mrs. J. Mylin Will (Louise Ley.) Lieut. and Mrs. Will are visiting here from San Francisco, where they have made their home since their honeymoon. An open house, to which 150 invitations have been issued, will follow the dinner.

Honors Musician

One of the week's delightful affairs in the musical world was the buffet supper given Monday evening by Mme. Emma Loeffler de Zaruba for George Liebling, celebrated composer-pianist, and Mrs. Liebling. A program during the affair was given over entirely to Liebling compositions, with the composer as soloist, assisted by the hostess, a dramatic soprano; Beatrice Huntley, contralto; Viola Graham, lyric soprano; Ludwig Poerstel, 'cellist and Mrs. Ruth Brady, accompanist.

An early spring decorative scheme was used, with snapdragons, lilies, roses and anemones. Their guests were Mr. and Mrs. Roy H. Rogers, Miss C. Brandon, Mrs. L. W. Bryant of New York, Mr. and Mrs. L. S. Sharps, Mr. and Mrs. L. B. Chatterton and E. J. Moriarty.

At Homes

The Ralph Waldo Trines will be at home to their friends for the fifth consecutive "first Sunday" both afternoon and evening today from 3 to 5 p.m. and from 8 to 12 p.m. These monthly gatherings bring together from the Trines' large circle of friends and acquaintances many representatives from the fields of literature, music, art and philosophy and while there is never a planned program there is always a spontaneous sharing of interests and talents. The "at homes" are to continue throughout the season and invitations to them are still being sent out.

Buffet Supper

In honor of Santa Erd, Wagnerian soprano, who has come to Los Angeles for an indefinite sojourn, Judge and Mrs. Guy Bush were hosts Friday evening at their home in Serrano avenue, entertaining with a buffet supper and musicale. Thirty-five guests were delighted with several groups of seldom-heard Schumann and Schubert songs as sung by the honoree.

Return from Arizona

Mr. and Mrs. William Leister of 1941 Fletcher avenue have returned from Arizona, where they attended the marriage of their daughter, Miss Helen Bain, to John Stutsman of Alton, Ill., January 6. Mr. and Mrs. Stutsman will make their home at Canyon Lake, near Mesa, Ariz.

Wednesday Mrs. Louise Willetts of Port Washington, L. I., arrived to be the house guest of Mr. and Mrs. Leister. She will pass the remainder of the winter in Southern California.

Luncheon Party

Among the pleasant affairs of recent date was the luncheon party, given Thursday at the Mary Louise by Miss M. H. Shortlidge of Pasadena, the decorations carrying out a colorful motif with a large basket of gay-hued stock and daisies, the guests including Mrs. Joseph Hilles of Wilmington, Del., Mrs. William A. Brewer, wife of Dean Brewer of Burlingame, Cal., the Misses Chanute of the Vista Del Arroyo, and Miss Audrey Shortlidge of Pasadena.

Scholarship Luncheon

An event of this month which is attracting the interest of women prominent in social and university circles is the annual scholarship luncheon sponsored by the Town and Gown Club of the University of Southern California to be held Wednesday, the 19th inst., at the Women's Residence Hall, 666 West Thirty-sixth street.

The motif of the luncheon is revealed in the artistic invitations which contain this couplet:

"A Valentine we'll give to you
Please bring a book, one old or new."

Reservations for this luncheon are in charge of Mrs. A. C. La Touche and Mrs. Frank C. Touton.

Cabel-Earnest

Miss Alice L. Cabel, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Cabel of 838 South Detroit street, and Howard F. The bride was attractively gowned in a smart ensemble of dahlia-colored crepe, with matching accessories, and her flowers were a corsage of valley lilies. Mr. and Mrs. Leon D. Woods assisted as best man and matron of honor, respectively. After a honeymoon, spent motoring south, Mr. and Mrs. Earnest will be at home at 6101 Afton Place, Hollywood.

Formal Dinner-Dance

One of the most colorful and picturesque formal dinner-dances of the season was given by Delta Chi Omega Sorority last Friday evening at the Deauville Beach Club with Miss Maurine Brown, sorority president, and Mrs. Dorothea Grant, vice-president, in charge.

Especially attractive were the table decorations following the Valentine motif with dark red double carnations and pale blue delphenium centering the table. Tall red tapers, red satin hearts used in profusion, and cleverly designed dance programs furthered the idea. Favors were blue linen handkerchiefs monogrammed with silver thread to carry out the sorority colors, blue and silver.

The sorority mother, Mrs. Alexander Taylor, shared honors with the guest of the evening, Mrs. Dale Lynch.

Those included were Mmes. Dorothea Grant, Gladys, Coles, Harriet McClellan, Geraldine Hogan, Ruth Martin, Misses Ethel Payne, Betty Steere, Maurine Brown, Bernice Brown, Katherine Wiley, Phebe Craft, Marjory Stanley, Mary Skelton and Messrs. Maxwell Grant, Calverton Coles, Herbert McClellan, Bud Hogan, Dr. Burton Martin, George Bradbeer, Dr. R. R. De Krief, Erwin Wallace, Johnny Wallace, Nelson Patton, Frank Kelly, George Laws and James Lieb.

Preceding this dance there was a week-end house party at Camp Baldy.

Silver Wedding Anniversary

One of the lovely anniversary celebrations of last month was the surprise affair given January 24 by Miss Dorothy Anderson in honor of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Anderson of 2341 North Catalina street, many of the forty guests in attendance having also attended the marriage of the honorees twenty-five years ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, who had been dinner guests of Mr. and Mrs. Charles T. Slater of Burbank, were taken to their home after the party had assembled, entering to the strains of the Mendelssohn "Wedding March." Assisting Miss Anderson in receiving were Miss Helen Slater and Thayer Slater, costumed as a young bride and bridegroom.

A program, which included folk dances by little Virginia Reese of Venice, and "O, Promise Me," sung by Mrs. John Searle of North Kingsley Drive, was followed by cards and a supper, for which the dinning-room and table were beautifully decorated with a bridal motif.

Martin of 129 South Bonnie Brae, entertained Thursday afternoon with a smartly appointed luncheon-bridge at the Mary Louise, a profusion of bright-hued spring flowers being effectively combined with ferns and foliage in the table decoration. Montana Woman Lost
17 Pounds Weight In 4 Weeks
Here's a letter written in October 21, 1929, by Mrs. Fred Barringer of Lewiston, Montana, that ought to be read by every overweight woman in America.
When stout women can lose fat and at the same time gain in energy and vigor.
Gain in charm and vivaciousness.
Gain a healthy complexion and have eyes that sparkle with buoyant health.
And at insignificant cost—isn't it time to use common sense?
Please read this letter carefully:
"Gentlemen:
I first saw your advertisement in a Billings, Montana, paper and decided to try Kruschen Salts.
I was the first to purchase a bottle in Billings.
I started taking them every morning as directed as I was very much overweight and wanted to reduce.
I had tried going on a diet but would get so hungry that my diet would not last long, so I decided to give "Kruschen Salts" a fair trial. The day I started to take them I weighed 256 lbs. and at present, which has been just four weeks, I weigh 239 lbs. And I must say, I feel better in every way, besides looking much better.
I have recommended Kruschen Salts to many of my friends, in fact, have a number of them taking Kruschen Salts.
May all large people, both men and women, who want to reduce in an easy way, give Kruschen Salts a fair trial. Just try one bottle and by following directions, I am sure it will convince any one. I bought my second bottle today."
A bottle of Kruschen Salts that lasts four weeks costs but 85c at any Owl Drug Store, or any drug store in America.—[Advertisement.

Lovely Marion Lee of "My Girl Friday" prefers the PLAIN BOB. Proper care keeps her hair in wonderful condition.

The easy way to have soft, wavy, gleaming hair...

THE modern sculptured bobs do wonders to bring out your personality. But like other present-day models of arranging the hair, they call attention to it. That's why it's so important nowadays to keep your hair soft, lustrous, abundant. The easiest and quickest way to give new lustre and color to hair, which has begun to look dull and lifeless, is with Danderine. And it makes the hair softer, easier to arrange; holds it in place.

Here's all you do. Each time you use your brush just put a little Danderine on it. It removes the oily film from your hair; brings out its natural color; gives it more gloss than brilliantine. Waves "set" with it stay in longer.

Danderine dissolves the crust of dandruff; puts the scalp in the pink of condition. It stops falling hair. A small bottle is enough to show its merit. Start on it tonight.

Doings of the Week in Society of Southland min Walter, Eugena Sabin and Charles E. Kaiser.

At U.C.L.A.

Enlivening the social season of this semester which ended yesterday are found fraternity and sorority dances and class affairs. The recent semester has been filled to the brim with parties and teas of every type. It might seem as though there had been no time for studies, but the final examinations will show whether this be true.

As a fitting close to the semester's activities and as a good beginning to the new school term, members and pledges of the Alpha Phi Sorority entertained with a week-end house party given in the Hilgard-avenue chapter house. Miss Thelma Dexter was in charge and her program consisted of riding and tennis in the afternoon of Saturday, dinner and corsages for the guests at the house, and seats for the U.C.L.A.-U.S.C. basketball game. Returning to the house, the guests were met by a miniature "Monte Carlo" and provided with imitation money for gambling. A midnight supper concluded the outing.

Alpha Psi of the Alpha Chi Omega Sorority entertained with a formal dance at the Hollywood Country Club on the 17th inst. Music for the dancing was furnished by Brad Ormsby's orchestra. Miss Katherine Lou Crawford planned the affair.

Honoring the alumnae of the Alpha Psi chapter, the sorority gave a dinner the thirteenth inst. The sorority colors of scarlet and olive green carried out the decorations scheme. The pledges entertained with a skit and original dances.

Faculty members of this university were entertained on January 15, by the Sigma Kappa Sorority with a formal dinner at the chapter house. The guests included Dean Helen Matthewson Laughlin, Miss Katherine Laughlin, Miss Ruth Atkinson who is head of the physical-education department, Dr. and Mrs. Robinson, and Mr. and Mrs. Louis F. Brioix.

Members and pledges of the Alpha Xi Delta Sorority entertained with a bridge tea at the chapter house the afternoon of January 25. Double blue and gold, the colors of the sorority, were used in the decorations. The Misses Ella Jo Covington and Mary Campbell were in charge of the affair.

Active members of the Delta Zeta Sorority were the guests at a delightful bridge given by Dr. and Mrs. Henry R. Brush on January 15. Mrs. Brush was assisted by her daughter, Miss Betty Brush, who was graduated from U.C.L.A. two years ago and is a member of the organization. Dr. Brush is a professor in the French department of the university and, with Mrs. Brush, is a patron of the local chapter of Delta Zeta.

To the music of Glen Edmunds's orchestra, members of Delta Zeta and their friends enjoyed a pleasant evening of dancing at a benefit dance given by the sorority, on the roof of the Hollywood Storage Company Building Saturday, January 18.

The committee in charge included the Misses Helen Cooley and Mary Ellen Hoheisel, place; Miss Ruth Edwards, orchestra; Miss Mary Lou Hood, refreshments; and Miss Zeta McAllister, tickets. Supervising the affair was Miss Joyce Myers, social chairman of Delta Zeta.

Affairs of every variety have been held by the members of the Alpha Omicron Pi Sorority in honor of Mrs. Leland F. Leland of Minneapolis, editor of the official national magazine of the sorority. Mrs. Leland was the guest of honor at a tea given by the local chapter at the house on Hilgard from 3 to 6 p.m. last Thursday.

Mrs. C. H. Ritter entertained for Mrs. Leland with a tea on January 21 and Mrs. Verne McKinney was hostess at a bridge luncheon on January 25.

The Los Angeles alumnae chapter of the sorority planned a luncheon given at the Westwood chapter house on January 25. Members of the Minnesota and Wisconsin chapters acted hostesses.

Saturday, January 25, was the date of the annual formal dance of the Zeta Psi Fraternity held at the Palomar Tennis Club, in the form of a dinner-dance and tables of different sizes were placed about the dance floor. Shortly after midnight a breakfast was served. Music was furnished by Les Hite's colored orchestra obtained by Wallace Burton and John Fellows, who were in charge of the evening.

Pledges of the Kappa Sigma Fraternity entertained the local chapter at a dinner-dance last Friday evening. About fifty couples attended the affair which was held at the Pacific Coast Club in Long Beach. Decorations featured the colors of the fraternity, scarlet, green and white. The committee in charge was headed by Dudley Tower.

Smart Affair

Mrs. John F. Prahl of Long Beach was hostess Thursday afternoon of last week in the Mary Louise Tea Room at a delightful luncheon party to a group of friends, several of whom are winter visitors from the East and North. The table was gay with a lovely arrangement of Southland blossoms, sweet peas, stock and snapdragons, with blending tulle. Those bidden were Mmes. Leroy A. Goddard of Chicago, Anabel Neill and Frank D. Jones of Helena, Mont.; George Gagnon of Butte, Mont.; J. S. Dutton of Long Beach and Edward Neill of Los Angeles.

For Bride-Elect

In honor of Miss Lois McQuistion, one of the most popular brides-elect of the season Miss Marian Gaffney entertained Wednesday afternoon with a luncheon and bridge at the Beverly Wilshire, seventy guests being bidden. Violets and harmonizing flowers were combined with ferns on the luncheon tacble and the hostess was assisted by Mrs. Donald Greenwood, Mrs. Max Hebgen, Mrs. Raymond Tremaine and Miss Winifred Huntington. Corsages of the fragrant blossoms formed the place cards and bridge featured the afternoon's entertainment.

DANCE ENRICHES ALUMNAE FUND

Hostesses at High School Affair

Misses Lolita Mead and Virginia Cheap

ONE of the delightful affairs of the past week was the dance given Friday evening at the Beverly Hills Women's Club by the alumnae of the Conaty High School, the proceeds of the affair being devoted to the scholarship fund of the alumnae. Miss Lolita Mead is president of the alumnae, while Miss Virginia Cheap was one of the hostesses.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS of THE ARMY AND NAVY

The Jonathan Club has been the smart rendezvous for a number of attractive informal navy parties during the season. Sunday evening, Lieutenant-Commander and Mrs. A. S. Wolfe, U.S.S. Tennessee, entertained in the club with a small dinner for a group of Tennessee officers and their wives who leave this coast soon for a change of duty. Those who motored into town included Lieutenant-Commander and Mrs. Wolfe, Commander and Mrs. Ronan C. Grady, Commander and Mrs. Milton Petzold, Lieutenant-Commander and Mrs. E. M. Senn and Lieut. and Mrs. H. R. Parker.

Interesting visitors at the harbor over the past week-end were Mrs. Horace Boone and her two young daughters, Misses Marjorie and Betty Boone, house-guests of Lieut. and Mrs. Leland Steeves, U.S.S. Colorado. Mrs. Boone and her daughters, who arrived from Pensacola, Fla., sailed early in the week aboard the S.S. Venezuela for Nicaragua where they will join Lieutenant-Commander Boone (medical corps.) Sunday afternoon, Lieut. and Mrs. Steeves entertained with a luncheon at Pacific Coast Club for Mrs. Boone and invited as other guests, Capt. and Mrs. W. C. Watts, Commander and Mrs. J. P. Olding, Lieutenant-Commander and Mrs John H. Paige, and Ensign and Mrs. Norman Garton.

Many farewell parties have been given for Commander Milton Petzold, former chaplain on board the U.S.S. Tennessee, and Mrs. Petzold, who left Wednesday for Parris

You'll Get Rid of Blackheads Sure

There is one simple, safe and sure way that never fails to get rid of blackheads, that is to dissolve them.

To do this get two ounces of calonite powder from any drug store—sprinkle a little on a hot, wet cloth—rub over the blackheads briskly—wash the parts and you will be surprised how the blackheads have disappeared. Big blackheads, little blackheads, no matter where they are, simply dissolve and disappear. Blackheads are a mixture of dust and dirt and secretions that form in the pores of the skin. The calonite powder and the water dissolve the blackheads so they wash right out, leaving the pores free and clean and in their natural condition.—[Advertisement.]

What Hostesses Have Been About Lately

Island, S. C., where Commander Petsold has received orders for shore duty. The Petsolds have gone overland and are enjoying thirty days' leave visiting friends in Boston and New York. Before her departure, Mrs. Petsold was hostess at an informal luncheon for wives of chaplains of the battle fleet. With Pacific Coast Club as the setting for the party, Mrs. Petsold used roses and sweet peas in pastel shades to decorate her table and covers were marked for Mmes. M M. Leonard, E. L. Ackiss, W. W. Elder, H. P. Forsander, A. C. Vogler, W. L. Thompson and M. M Witherspoon.

More than sixty members of the younger Army and Navy set from Los Angeles and the Harbor are to be guests at a smart dinner-dance with which Mrs. Ralph S. Granger, wife of the late Col. Granger, U.S.A., and her daughter, Miss Helene Granger will entertain at their home in Santa Monica Saturday night.

Mrs. William Sullivan, wife of Lieutenant-Commander Sullivan, executive officer aboard the naval transport Chaumont arrived from San Diego last week and is passing several days in Long Beach as the house-guest of Mrs. Ben Purrington, wife of Lieut. Purrington of the Chaumont.

There are many delightful social diversions for the Army set at Fort MacArthur during the winter and perhaps the most interesting of these are the monthly hops held in the post clubhouse and attended not only by army officers and their wives but their navy and civilian friends as well. Saturday night's event, preceded by a number of informal dinner parties, was the first of the New Year and was attended by scores of guests who enjoyed dancing to the strains of the post orchestra until midnight when a buffet supper was served. Capt. and Mrs. W. H. Twyman entertained at their quarters before the dance, using a color scheme of pink and rose in their appointments. In the party were Col. and Mrs. Robert F. Woods, Maj. and Mrs. C. W. McMillan, Maj. and Mrs. John Hood and Maj. Lehmen. Covers were marked for twenty at a dinner at which Mr. and Mrs. M. L. Mayer of San Pedro were hosts honoring Mr and Mrs. Paul A. Montanus, house-guests of Lieutenant-Commander and Mrs. R. J. Weeks, U.S.N.

Capt. and Mrs. Twyman issued invitations for two attractive parties last week, a bridge dinner for twelve Tuesday night and a similar affair Wednesday evening. Both events complimented Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Beers of New Rochelle, N. Y., who are stopping in Los Angeles, and their daughter, Mrs. Oliver Gilbert, wife of Lieut. Gilbert, U.S.A. Lieut. and Mrs. Gilbert (Florence Beers) will sail Saturday on the army transport for the Philippines where Lieut. Gilbert has received orders for two years' shore duty and Mr. and Mrs. Beers came out from the East to be near their daughter before she leaves. Lieut. Gilbert and his bride were married at West Point soon after Lieut. Gilbert was graduated from West Point with the class of 1929 and their first tour of duty has been at Fort MacArthur.

Narcissus, pink roses and carnations carried out a fragrant spring-time setting when Mrs. Robert F. Woods, wife of Col. Woods, U.S.A., entertained at her Fort MacArthur quarters with a luncheon and bridge for Mrs. W. C. Knight of Richmond, Va.; a winter visitor in Los Angeles, and Mrs. Paul A. Montanus, house-guest of her sister, Mrs. R. J. Weeks in San Pedro.

Bidden to meet the guests of honor were Mmes. Philip Golderman, wife of Col. Golderman, U.S.A., of Los Angeles, and her daughter, Mrs. Sewall, Olney Place, Pierre Bayne Huff, M. M. Dupre, Walter C. Holt, Preston Mercer, Charles Hoffman and John T. Bowers, Jr.

La Venta Inn was the picturesque setting chosen by Mrs. Ernest Charles Johnson, wife of Lieut. Johnson, U.S.S. Procyon, for a charming luncheon and bridge with which she entertained for a group of service friends Wednesday afternoon. St. Valentine's Day was artfully suggested in the crimson and deep red of the flowers and tapers and in the holiday favors appointing the attractive luncheon table.

Motoring over to enjoy the party were Mmes. T. P. Magruder, E. D. Almy, William Henry Wilterdink, Chris Norstad, William Sands Holloway, Thomas T. Hassell, Emory Stephens, H. L. Wyatt, A. B. Davidson, James Brennesn, Robert H. Lenson, C. R. Lamdin, Robert Sayre, G. C. Tasker, J. E. Curry, H. C. Lowry, Alfred Harris, L. H. Desmond and James B. Bliss.

One of the largest events on the social calendar, which is being crowded with a round of luncheons, dinners and teas before the fleet's departure, was the bridge-luncheon given by Mrs. C. L. Jacobsen, wife of Lieutenant-Commander Jacobsen, and Mrs. Robert David Threshie, wife of Lieut. Threshie, U.S.S. Idaho. The two hostesses entertained at the attractive Virginia Country Club in Long Beach and used yellow acacia and orchid stock as a lovely setting for their tables.

RESORT AND HOTEL NOTES

With the return of clear weather tourists and residents of Southern California are turning again toward Warner's. During the recent storm the resort was cut off for a few days, but the roads are again in excellent shape with the exception of the road from Temecula to the springs. Visitors are advised to drive via San Diego or by way of Oceanside, Pala and Henshaw Dam.

Recent arrivals at Warner Hot Springs include the following: Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Jess, D. Peters, E. E. Barnett and Miss Barnett, W. C. Allen, L. Margoles, Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Yon, Mr. and Mrs. Victor Hoenig and Mr. and Mrs. Perry L. Smith, all of Los Angeles; Dr. and Mrs. E. J. Hamke and Mrs. E. Free of Long Beach; Misses Emilie and Harriet Boulanger and Miss Ann B. Mason of Laguna Beach; Mrs. R. E. Brown of Portland, Or.; L. W. Willingham and J. E. Phipps of Hollywood; E. L. Christensen of Orange, E. J. Bersinger and A. M. Lindsby of Riverside, Mrs. A. M. Last week-end a gay throng of guests crowded the Forest Home resort, and many persons not fortunate in having advance reservations were unable to obtain accommodations.

About a foot of snow proved most attractive to those seeking winter sports. Children as well as the older guests made the most of the sleds and toboggans.

The Forest Home Angling Club, which adjoins the resort, reported much activity. Many fine catches of trout added to the day's sports.

The Peck-Judah Travel Bureau of Los Angeles states that the demand for the Oberammergau Passion Play has proven to be so great that they have arranged with their European representatives, the Knickerbocker Travel Service, to run an all inclusive personally conducted tour, leaving Los Angeles or San Francisco June 30 and returning to the Pacific Coast, August 30. In order also to comply with the slogan of "See America First" they are arranging for sightseeing in Chicago and Niagara Falls.

In addition to the visit to the Passion Play the tour also includes England, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy and France.

Musical numbers by a quartet from the Glendale Sanitarium were featured on the Saturday night program of Switzerland last night, also college stunts by a group of students from Occidental College. The students group and the male quartet will also participate in the Switzerland chapel service this morning. A large group of young people from the Highland Park Presbyterian Church are also spending the week end at Switzerland.

On February 8 a violin and piano recital will be given by Mr. and Mrs. Ingwald Wicks, popular Norwegian violinist and concert pianist.

The following were among the guests from Los Angeles enjoying a stay at Paso Robles Hot Springs Hotel, Paso Robles, last week: Mr. and Mrs. H. Wilins, Milton J. Simons, O. E. Gallenkamp, Charles H. SCREEN LOVERS NOW WARBLE SENTIMENT

Cupid's Darts Puncture Hearts to Melodic Strains and Venus is Lured from Pedestal by Lilting Tenors and Dynamic Barilones

The outlook for the year brightens as demand decrees that screen romances of the future shall be more harmonious. Henceforeward, Cupid's arrows shall be shot before the camera to a melody and Venus moved only by a song.

As the old order changes through the inrush of musical comedy, musical operetta, music one-way or another, the great lovers of the screen, discovering a forgotten voice, or imported singing lovers from the stage can be heard sighing their relief all over Hollywood. Ask any lover, great or near-great, which he would rather do, sing of love or speak it and promptly he will loosen his lilting tenor and carol feelingly, "Ah, a little song will go a long, long way."

Love in plain, every-day language, is out of tune now. Even the leading man's prettiest speeches, or the leading lady's softest coo doesn't mean a thing since "Say It With Song" has become the by-word of the screen.

Song has changed the whole technique of film love-making. Love must be made at a distance while the hero pours forth his soul and the heroine smiles patiently till it is time for her soprano response. Noticing musical pictures of the day, it may be found that love scores are growing idealistic in place of realistic. Those involved appear more in love with love than with each other, which probably accounts for their seeming rapture. Personal touches are disappearing; fewer and fewer are those long-awaited clinches.

Unanimous is the feeling among lovers that things are better as they are. They agree that to sing love frees them of any embarrassment had in speaking it.

TENOR OR BARITONE

The question arises, who is the better lover, a tenor or a baritone? Among the film colony the matter is still unsettled. Pure tenors are scarce. To John Boles, that is the reason why tenors instantly capture feminine hearts. What is rare immediately appeals to them. Boles, himself, is a high baritone, as are most of the singing lovers of the screen. Their high register contains many of the tenor's lyric notes. Their lower tones fit them for hardier roles, outside a tenor's range. A tenor is an indoor lover, while a baritone is more dynamic and can make himself heard all over the great open spaces.

The biggest tenor in the business, at the present time, is John McMormack, although he will not be classed as a lover, great or small. Then, there is Don Jose Mojica, who keeps the even tenor of his ways all through "One Mad Kiss."

Johnny T. Murray, radio singer and motion-picture player, is a staunch believer in song. "Singing of love," he avers, "is its most complete expression because singing plays directly upon the emotions."

Mr. Murray also has a theory that a tenor could make the quintessence of sleek villainy, a Roy D'Arcy part.

Ramon Novarro is a lyric tenor who finds himself more at ease now that he can warble his tenderest sentiments. Novarro is one who loses none of his recklessness because of a higher tonal quality.

BARITONE HAVING DAY

But the beloved baritone is having his day. Stories run now to the swashbuckling, costume, or outdoor type, each suited to the baritone brand of melody. Lawrence Tibbett's operatic tones are proving a sensation as is he, a hero of the above category. Dennis King, baritones in "The Vagabond King." There are J. Harold Murray, Alexander Gray, Walter Pidgeon, Allan Prior, Maurice Chevalier is a comedian.

Villainy in song would run to the low base. Noah Beery is said to have such a powerful one that he once broke the microphone in an explosion of pure meanness.

Pasadena Will Hear Trio and Famous Quartet

The Pasadena Community Playhouse and Alice Coleman Batcheldor, founder and director of the Coleman chamber concerts, announce that the Norfleet Trio of New York will play in Pasadena this afternoon, at 3:30 o'clock, giving the second junior chamber concert.

The Norfleet Trio programs for young people are nationally recognized as having unique artistic and educational value. The late Louis Svecenski of the Kneisel Quartet wrote of these programs that they were doing in the field of chamber music what the Damrosch concerts for young people were doing in symphonic music.

Sunday's program will include selections from Brahms, Rameau, Haydn, Cadman, Grieg, Grainger, Stringfield, Debussy, Goossens, Saint-Saens and Leonard and also the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Trio in D Minor and a selection by Schutt.

Announcement is also being made of a series of four concerts by the London String Quartet. This series, the historic chamber concert series of the Coleman concert series, will be played at the home of Mrs. H. A. Everett, 171 South Grand avenue, on the evenings of the 13th, 18th, 20th and 22nd inst.

BAYREUTH SINGER LECTURES ON "RING"

An interesting announcement is the reading of "Rheingold," the prologue to "The Ring of the Nibelung" by Leon Rains at the El Capitan Theater on Monday. "The Ring of the Nibelung" is the largest achievement in the history of opera. "Rheingold" is a German heroic music-drama, the scene of which is mythological. Mr. Rains, who for nineteen years was connected with the Royal Opera of Dresden, sang in this opera in 1904 at Bayreuth.

The program given for the Opera Reading Club of Hollywood, Mrs. Louis Jaques, president, includes such well-known artists assisting, as Melba French Barr, Nelle Gothold, Clemence Gifford, Ivan Edwardes, Leslie Brigham and Rollo Alford, with Lorna Gregg accompanying at the piano.

SMILE HELD TO BE RISK OF $250,000

Former Society Girl Soon to Be Here Runs Gamut of Show Business

BY PHILIP K. SCHEUER

Every time a frown creases the forehead of dark, attractive Fay Marbe, who brings her "Continental Night" to the Windsor Square Theater a week from this evening, the agents of a certain insurance company turn pale and gasp thinly. Miss Marbe's smile, you see, is a $250,000 risk.

Fay Marbe

There is nobody quite like Fay Marbe. In the seven years since she threw off the yoke of fashionably social cares back in Manhattan town, she has run the gamut of show business. The briefest recapitulation reveals that Miss Marbe played many musical comedies, two "straight" plays with music, eight months in vaudeville in the East and at the London Coliseum, a year with the British Broadcasting Company and WJZ, and no less than eight starring productions with the U.F.A. film company in Germany.

From the sum total of these seven years, she garnered—now here, now there—enough material for her "Continental Night." It is, for her, a happy medium for the interpretation of ultrasmart folklore of the mother country, a sort of classic whoopee midway between "Gotterdammerung" and "Bonny Boy." Thus, when Miss Marbe mischievously exclaims, "Wenn Ein Fraulein Keinen Herrn Hat," she is just putting a Teutonic touch to our own "What Do We Do on a Dew, Dew Dewy Day?" while a song like "Un Bon Mouvement" is so thinly disguised that even those of us who will never be able to pronounce "monsieur" correctly should have small difficulty in understanding and appreciating it.

Miss Marbe dances two numbers—a tango and the Blue Danube—with her brother Gilbert. In the latter she wears a lovely, scarce-tangible creation (175 or 1750 yards of blue net, she told me, and I felt properly impressed) of her own designing. In fact, all her gowns are products of her own imagination and skill—little things she tossed off, so to speak, when there was nothing to occupy the time between a matinee and an evening performance except a radio broadcast, a talking-picture test, a dance or two with the Prince of Wales at the Cafe de Paris and a bite to eat at the Savoy.

FILM DOLLARS PUT TO WORK

Stars Invest in Unromantic Side Lines Against Time When Contracts May be Few

BY MARY MAYER

Being a motion-picture star has its advantages. All one has to do to prove it is to put out an SOS call for candidates and the thundering herd galloping to Hollywood shakes the roofs on the casting offices.

But being just a film player with no side line in the way of an occupation is fast becoming declasse. The actors and actresses, no matter how high in the profession they happen to be roosting, are beginning to appreciate that some day they may have difficulty in getting a contract.

And so here, there and everywhere around the studios, you will find the players earnestly preparing for the day when Carl Laemmle, Cecil De Mille, Adolph Zukor or one of the other magnates will be saying:

"Big girl, you are putting too much emphasis on the 'big.' You're fifteen pounds overweight and you can't have that lead."

DIVERSIFIED BUSINESS

The private business enterprises into which screen capital is being invested are getting more diversified every day and the amount of money invested is increasing proportionately.

From ventures as unromantic as operating a garage or a sawmill, these diversions run the gamut or teaching vocal lessons and sketching caricatures for magazines.

Louise Dresser is the individual who decided that while it might be romantic or sentimental to own a repair shop for automobiles it was at least profitable. So Miss Dresser sank a carload of her hard-earned money into a Sunset Boulevard garage, and at last reports was cutting coupons.

Automobiles and allied lines must have their attractions because William Beaudine, director, has his dollars working in spare moments through the agency of a Vine-street car-washing establishment.

To J. Harold Murray of "Married in Hollywood" and "Cameo Kirby" fame, came the sawmill inspiration. Murray inherited, through a family legacy, the controlling interest in a Connecticut mill. After taking one look over the profit and loss statement for the preceding year, he decided his money was better placed in the gyrations of saws and belts than in a new roadster and a Hollywood wardrobe.

OPERATES RANCH

Gary Cooper, who for years rode the Montana range, is maintaining his family's reputation as ranch operators. Gary has for some time past, been using a large part of his salary paying out on 7000 acres near Gary, Mont., his birthplace. So well is the scheme working that he has options on a holding almost as large in Arizona. Cooper combines cattle raising with riding herd on an annual crop of eastern dudes. The price on beef may be not always of the best—but the dudes, through careful examination of their financial standing before they are permitted to register, can always pay.

Edmund Lowe, by the way, is an enthusiastic proponent of ranch operations. Lowe has 1200 acres in the Santa Cruz Mountains, near San Jose. Grapes are the main crop and if prohibition is ever abolished, a certain Mr. E. Lowe sees in his land a new colored kind of liquid gold.

Allan Prior, First National contract player, plays no favorites, as far as the League of Nations is concerned, in his land holdings. He claims title to a tract in Australia, where he raises sheep—and another here in California specializing in highly bred cows.

On the opposite side of the ledger, far from the plebian diversions of the aforementioned group, is Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., who goes in for poetry and the highbrow magazines. Fairbanks has just received a contract for a series of short stories and caricatures for Vanity Fair.

Alexander Gray is another of the crowd who is giving the arts a

ALIENS RETAIN SCREEN NICHE

Sound Films Disclose Need of Many Accents

Separate Pictures Made for Different Countries

Certainty of Future Held as Settled Fact

BY ELENA BOLAND

As soon as the screen began to talk, rumor started. What would become of those foreign players who in their silence had carved a niche for themselves with the American public? The first generalization was that they were "through," and with some that has proved correct. Many, unable to cope with the English idiom, returned to their native lands. But there were others, more determined or more linguistic, who set out to master our tongue, and they are now able to face a microphone without fear and with success.

Within the past few months, the uncertainty felt among the foreign colony has changed to hope. Talkies have so clicked that they are in demand in numerous countries. To fulfill this popularity, Hollywood is furnishing not only foreign versions of current pictures, but separate productions solely for Spanish and German-speaking countries, independent of any English version.

ACCENTS REQUIRED

The foreigner is again welcomed in Hollywood. There are three places for him: foreign versions, musical productions where singing and especially dancing of quality are appreciated regardless of accent, and lastly, those English-speaking films which call for certain roles to be played with various accents. This latter group is the most predominant and, to fit themselves for such, many American actors acquire a slight accent, while those foreigners who speak English not too plainly find they fit in nicely. Opportunities for dancers of different nationalities seem to be extensive during this present run of the musical picture.

Many of the foreign colony are being kept busy at the Universal studios, where foreign productions or foreign bits in American pictures are now the cry. The filming of that book which has amazed the readers of several continents, "All Quiet on the Western Front," calls for three French damsels in the canal sequence. These roles are played by Yola D'Avril, Poupee Andriot and Renee Damonde. Miss D'Avril, best known of the three, has appeared before on our screens, but the other two were practically unknown before this opportunity, although they have been in Hollywood several years. In the picture they speak entirely in their mother tongue, French. Every other word in this story of a foreign people is to be spoken in English.

The Sisters G, flowers of Germany, were noted throughout Europe for their dancing. They are now at Universal dancing in the Paul Whiteman revue, "The King of Jazz."

Nancy Torres, born in Guadalajara, Mex., is also singing her way through the revue and is signed for a number of Spanish productions which Universal is planning. Up to this time, Spanish audiences have preferred films synchronized with music and song, so the output has included mostly two-reel sing-

CRIMINAL CONDITIONS AIRED

Timely Book Details Results of Harvard Survey of States Penal Institutions

BY LILLIAN C. FORD

500 CRIMINAL CAREERS. By Sheldon Glueck and Eleanor T. Glueck. Alfred A. Knopf. New York.

With interest in conditions in State penal institutions high at the present moment, the results of the Harvard Crime Survey as embodied in this new volume by two experts in criminology should attract wide attention here.

The survey was thoroughgoing; it was financed from the Milton Fund of Harvard University; it was carried on by specially trained people; and its sole object was to discover what becomes of ex-convicts and why.

More than 90 per cent of the 510 men released from the Massachusetts Reformatory during the years 1911-22 were traced after a five-to-fifteen-year period. It was found that 80 per cent were not reformed, but had gone right on committing crimes after their discharge. And yet the authors of this study maintain that only from 3 to 5 per cent of criminals are recalcitrant. Ninety-five to 97 per cent are perfectly amenable to intelligent reform methods. The question as to why such methods are not used, and the large number of possible reforms made, is the one that is agitating society today and that is studied in a clearer way than ever before in this volume.

METHODS ASSAILED

The authors charge that American reformatories are using methods in treating criminals which are based on fear and superstition, rather than on scientific therapy. The suppression of the Mutual Welfare League at Auburn, N. Y., is pointed to as a sign of the breakdown of old methods and also as a sign of admitted incompetence.

"American prisons, now the scenes of open revolt in many States, are administered uneconomically and inefficiently, with systems of discipline which are illogical," Dr. Sheldon Glueck, who is a noted prison expert and assistant professor of criminology at Harvard University, declares in an authorized interview.

"The chief fault, actually, of our prison system," Dr. Glueck says, "is the failure of our administrators to realise that most criminals are coming back to society when they leave the reformatory and that we do not want them to return with a grudge against society. Yet they are treated in such a manner as to instill intense hatred in them.

REFORMS URGED

"Under these circumstances it is obvious that our prisons are uneconomically and illogically administered. They are built and run for the 5 per cent instead of for the 95 per cent, although containing both groups.

"To be efficient and economical," Dr. Glueck continues, "our prisons should be built and run for the 95 per cent who can be reformed. If that were done, prison riots would become things of the past."

Welfare leagues should be maintained in all prisons, he says. If they do not work it is usually the fault of the prison officials who do not use discrimination in admitting members to the league. Most prisoners benefit from the league, Dr. Glueck claims, and should be given this opportunity to be trained in social co-operation and responsibility.

Eleanor T. Glueck reports that the great majority of women now in reformatories are guilty of sexual delinquency, while the majority of men in State institutions are guilty of larceny. This fact, Mrs. Glueck points out, indicates the need for an entirely different method of handling women delinquents than men. It is also indicative of the different psychological reactions of men and women to the same social influences leading to crime. In this book Dr. and Mrs. Glueck analyze the factors which lead persons to break the law. Dr. Glueck believes that "500 Criminal Careers" is the first scientific work in this country which attempts to take the point of view of the prisoner as well as society.

TIBBETT WINS NEW FIELD

Talkie Hero Enjoys Acclaim of Public Approval for Fine Art of Singing and Acting in "Rogue Song"

BY ISABEL MORSE JONES

Journeying out to Beverly Hills to see the newest talkie hero in his home and hear how he likes his new pinnacle of fame, I found Lawrence Tibbett rather bemusedly asking, "What is it all about?"

He was surprised when he learned that the Mayor, the Manual Arts band, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer officials and many other important people had gathered at the station to greet him upon his arrival Wednesday and more surprised to find out that they hadn't telephoned the railway to find out that his train was three hours late and so were disappointed.

When he hurried out to the Chinese that afternoon to see himself in "The Rogue Song," he had a good time until the intermission and then was so surprised when he had to be introduced to the audience that the rest of the afternoon was a total loss. In the evening, Los Angeles' singing hero went out to see his friend Ramon Novarro's picture premiere at Carthay Circle and got writers cramp signing his name for autograph collectors every time he went out to smoke a cigarette. It is a new world to Tibbett and, of course, he is enjoying it immensely and gets a great thrill out of having people rave over his new venture, but he feels very much like the traditional goldfish too and the glare of klieg limelight is so much stronger that it is more disconcerting for the moment.

Don't think the Tibbetts have "gone Hollywood" for they haven't. Men who make their way to the top with music must, in the nature of things, have lived and suffered and striven too honestly to have their heads turned very far. True, there is a lovely new house in Beverly, furnished in marvelous modernism by the artist Lloyd Wright, and true it is that Tibbett has signed a contract for three years, of six months each, at a fabulous salary, and true again, that his Los Angeles concert on the 11th is practically sold out and Mr. Behymer is hoping he will sing an extra concert, but withal, the young man is mainly concerned with keeping his equilibrium and planning possible progress toward perfection in another picture.

At present he is officially on tour, of course. He will not be back home to begin his work-vacation until May. Prospects for real vacations for Tibbett for the next three years are rather slim. Judging by the sixteen and eighteen-hour days he put in this summer on "The Rogue Song," singing on tour and in opera at the Metropolitan will be periods of comparative relaxation for him in the future.

"The Rogue Song" was finished just two hours before he took the train for the East one day last September, and while Tibbett feels that this speed was contributory to a warmth and impetuosity in the play, he also wishes there had been time for some retakes and much the same sort of deliberate working out with the cast that made the George Arliss "Disraeli" so admirable to him.

PIANO ONLY TAUGHT BY STUDIO HERE

Rounded Courses Given For Purpose of Building Musicianship

The Olga Steeb Piano School is unique in that it is given over entirely to the study of piano playing and allied theoretical subjects.

A well-rounded-out course is given, with the main purpose of building musicianship. A thorough grounding in piano with the technical method of Olga Steeb is, of course, given special attention.

Olga Steeb and Lillian Steeb-French head the piano department, and under them is a staff of competent teachers, all of whom have studied for years. An important feature of the piano instruction is the recitals given monthly.

Harmony, counterpoint and composition are headed by Mary Carr Moore, composer of note.

The two-year course in piano normal and ear training is taught by Bernice Hall. Miss Hall is forming a new course of lectures in piano normal, stressing new ideas and material on children's work.

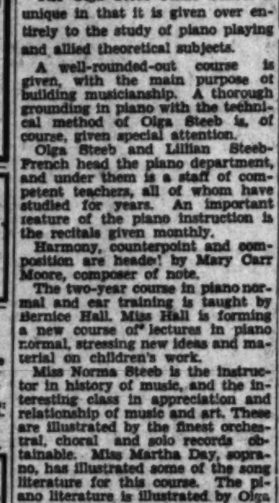
Miss Norma Steeb is the instructor in history of music, and the interesting class in appreciation and relationship of music and art. These are illustrated by the finest orchestral, choral and solo records obtainable. Miss Martha Day, soprano, has illustrated some of the song literature for this course. The piano literature is illustrated by Olga Steeb for her sister's classes, and is most enthusiastically and appreciatively received.

AUTHORITY TO SPEAK OF MUSIC MASTERS

Richard Buhlig is giving a series of three lecture-recitals at the Beaux Arts Auditorium on March 3, 17 and 31. Mr. Buhlig is very well known and his authority is unquestioned. He will give an introductory talk on the objective art of music at the first recital following it with a program of the finest works of Bach.

The second recital will deal with the subjective in music and include two major sonatas of Beethoven. The third will be on contemporary music and some of its forerunners and the program includes Franck, Debussy, Scriabin, Bartok, Schoenberg, Cowell, Chavés and Caturla.

CHICAGO LAD IS ORCHESTRA SOLOIST



Ralph Dobbs

The Philharmonic Orchestra management are introducing Ralph J. Dobbs, an American pianist, born and educated in Chicago, at the eighth Popular concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Los Angeles, Dr. Artur Rodzinski, conductor, next Sunday afternoon.

As a boy of 7 Dobbs began his studies with Alexander Raab, and has continued work with this master ever since. Just 21, this pianist has been enthusiastically received.

For his appearance with the Philharmonic Orchestra Mr. Dobbs will play the Dohanyi Concerto for Piano in E Minor, Op. 5, which will be given first hearing at these concerts. Other numbers programmed are Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," by Gluck; Miaskowsky Symphony No. 6 program closing with Caprice Espagnole, Op. 34, by Rimsky-Korsakow.

POPULAR TENOR TO APPEAR

Next Tuesday night Beniamino Gigli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, gives his only concert here at the Philharmonic Auditorium. Gigli started his career singing heavy dramatic roles—in fact, he made his debut in Italy in 1914 singing Enso in "La Gioconda," one of the most exacting of all dramatic roles. But later it became apparent that he was most popular in lighter music and he became the leading lyric tenor of Italy and South America and later in the United States.

Appearing with Gigli is Margaret Shotwell, popular American pianist, who will give two of her interesting piano interludes.

Miss Shotwell figured in the California news some years ago when she sought work as an extra girl with what was then the Mary Pickford Company, and she still has a voucher of $7.50 for services rendered over the face of which Jack Pickford has written "thank you."

The "thank you," however, was added after it became known that the girl whose bobbed curls were hidden under a sunbonnet, dressed in calico and a big bright apron, was America's newest "cigarette heiress." After her part in "The Valley of the Wolf," during the production of which she did a series of interviews called flapper impressions of movie stars for an Omaha newspaper, she was chosen to be Jack Pickford's new leading woman. But when a picture of the star and the youthful heiress-extra appeared in an Omaha paper the precocious Peggy received a peremptory summons to come home.

After the termination of her movie career she went to Paris to study music and made her debut at Cannes as a concert pianist. Last summer she was the infant artist of the Salzburg Music Festival. At 18 years of age she was the first of her sex to play in the Paris National Operahouse.

MUSICAL NEW-YORK

BY PIERRE V. R. KEY

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. — Farewells to William Mengelberg have been said; the Dutch conductor is now on the broad Atlantic, headed for his Amsterdam home. His final concert with the New York Philharmonic Symphony was formally labeled "for this season," yet the feeling generally is that Mengelberg will not return. Official action in the matter will presently be taken by the executive committee, but the decision may be withheld for a time from the public. In the meantime the doughty little leader is probably unhappy over the conclusion of affairs here—if "finis" has been written to his American career. For I doubt that he could be tempted to conduct any other American symphony orchestra.

I remember his debut at the head of the then National Symphony, a decade ago. He was the king then, and could do no wrong. Of late pretty much everything has been wrong . . . for many Philharmonic patrons.

Mengelberg—short stocky and smiling happily as he went about—was a musical lion of the hour in those early days. They hung too, until Toscanini's first guest appearances with Clarence Mackay's orchestra, some three years ago. After that the Dutch paled before the Italian, save for that one season which stimulated the tuxedo-haired leader to hit his old-time stride.

His farewell program last Sunday had two bright spots in it: the "Don Juan" symphonic poem of Strauss and the "Prelude and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." The audience gave him a hearty send-off, the people in the boxes and on the floor and in the balconies standing and applauding for several minutes.

I went back to add my "bon voyage" to that of others similarly inclined. I felt sorry for Mengelberg, who has done a great deal in building up the Philharmonic. While I regard his days of usefulness here as past, it still was possible to have sent him reasonably happy on his way. A decision in the matter of his withdrawal—if such proves now to have come to pass—could have been made by the Philharmonic last spring, and then followed by a finale that would have sent Mengelberg homeward in triumph, instead of with the dejected bearing he is now wearing.

HOFMANN'S HEAVY HEART

It took courage for Josef Hofmann to play his one New York recital of this season, recently given. He had lost two of his best friends, and within a few days o feach other. The first to pass was Alexander Lambert. Then Edward W. Bok passed.

I remember seeing in Lambert's home a photograph in which he is shown (a young man then) with the youthful Josef Hofmann perched on one knee. Through many years these two men have been extremely close; Mrs. Hofmann was a former Lambert pupil.

Mr. Bok and Hofmann had much in common, and had had . . . from those days, years ago, when the pianist became music counsel for the Ladies' Home Journal and wrote articles for each issue.

I have never heard the Chopin funeral march played as Josef Hofmann played it on the occasion of his recent Carnegie Hall recital. It was as masterfully done as was the remainder of the composition he offered.

"LES NOCES" TO BE GIVEN HERE

Rodzinski Will Present Stravinsky Work Before Local Chapter of Pro-Musica

Dr. Artur Rodzinsky will gather together an intimate orchestra of twenty pieces from the Philharmonic, and present Stravinsky's "Les Noces" and other novelties before the Los Angeles chapter of Pro-Musica this spring. It will be the fourth program of the year for Pro-Musica and will attract exceptional interest.

"Les Noces" has only been given in this country by Leopold Stokowski in New York. It was given at the Metropolitan by the League of Composers, with dancing, pantomime, singing and instrumental music and is expressive of primitive Russian wedding ceremonies. It is woven of certain traditional folk-songs and its harmony is polyphonic. Rhythm is its principal foundation.

Piano History Will be Given by Inventor

Three periods in the history and development of the pianoforte—yesterday, today and tomorrow—will be illustrated by Hans Barth, American pianist-composer, at his recital in Los Angeles the 7th inst. Mr. Barth will play first on the harpsichord of Handel's time, then on the present pianoforte, and again on a quartertone piano. Mr. Barth himself built the first quarter-tone piano and demonstrated it before a musical audience last season at the Hotel Plaza in New York.

The harpsichord which Mr. Barth will play is a reproduction of one of that time which Handel and Beethoven used and which is now in the Berlin Museum. This instrument has two keyboards and six pedals, each pedal changing the quality of tone. There is one string to each "note," which is twanged by crow-quills or bits of hard leather. This type of harpsichord was in use from 1700 to 1800.

Mr. Barth says of his quarter-tone piano:

"It opens a new language to music lovers. A new fluency of musical expression is immediately evident. The public, of course, must get used to it. Hearing it for the first time, one cannot pass judgment at once. Hearing a foreign language for the first time is very much the same thing. Sounds, for instance, which we think are beautiful in German, may sound discordant and guttural to one of another tongue. But in time the beauty of German or any other language is apparent, when the ear becomes accustomed to its intonations."

Cepparo, Here From Trieste, Opens Studio

With the opening of a studio of voice in Hollywood by L. Cepparo, teacher of singing, from Italy, not just another singing teacher has been added to the list of voice teachers, but a teacher of operatic singers, who have been and are now appearing in opera and concert in the operatic centers of Europe and America.

When Mr. Cepparo came to America seven years ago from Trieste, where he had taught singing, as well as having studied vocal art for fifteen years, after a short stay in New York, where he taught and concertized, he decided that the West was more interesting for a permanent residence than the East. So at the request of several of his students in New York, who were moving to Seattle and desired to further continue their study with him, he opened a studio there, where he taught for seven years.

NEW CONDUCTOR FOR FIRST CONCERT

Arthur Alexander

The Woman's Symphony Orchestra of Los Angeles, Arthur Alexander, conductor, will be presented in concert Friday evening at the Philharmonic Auditorium.

Founded in 1894, this ensemble of eighty musicians has won recognition and has contributed to the cultural development of our city.

Arthur Hartmann, violinist, will be the soloist at this concert. He has earned universal praise from press and public and has been heard in almost every part of the world. He is also widely known for his compositions and transcriptions.

The feature numbers on the program are Beethoven's Second Symphony and the Bach Concerto. Hartmann will play the latter and also some of his own transcriptions.

The Stage and Screen

"Ladies of the Jury"
Led by Mary Boland—will sit in judgment on the stage of El Capitan Theater beginning this afternoon and continuing for an indefinite period. The play is presented by Henry Duffy.

NAME STANDS FOR GAIETY

Mary Boland Finds it Best This Way, Although Once Tragic Roles Appealed

BY ELENA BOLAND

Daughter of the Irish, mistress of the stage, Mary Boland is now one of the "Ladies of the Jury." In this comic capacity she returns to Los Angeles after a five-year absence. Here, for some weeks, she will bring laughter to the El Capitan during the run of this play in which Mrs. Fiske scored a recent success.

Today the name, Mary Boland, stands for laughter; but it did not always. Miss Boland started her career in a dramatic way. Much of it that followed was likewise spent in interpreting the more serious messages of the theater. About six years ago she says she was practically forced into comedy and, with one exception, she has continued to embellish it ever since.

One topic which is unfailing in its possibilities to those who dwell on discussions of thespian art is, whether or not a tragedian can become a comedian, or a comedian a tragedian. Mary Boland considers it perfectly normal to find both potentialities within one person. Since she herself has demonstrated the theory, it assumes conviction.

Her one attempt several years ago to return to drama proved a disaster as far as her public's interest was concerned. Each night after a performance of "Women Go On Forever," Miss Boland declares she was afraid to open her mail, for she knew there would be letters expressing dissatisfaction. That was all right when she was a leading woman, but since her stardom, Boland and comedy combine to make a policy her audience will not have altered.

"Ladies of the Jury" is a new play to Mary Boland and she deems it an unusual one. Dealing with a murder trial, it offers the different slant of the comic value which may be brought out of such a circumstance through the actions and reactions of a jury. This, in a way, substantiates Miss Boland's idea that seriousness and humor belong to one another.

"I play the only real lady on the jury; the others are all opposite and distinct types. I appear frivolous, but turn out to be the real brains of the group. With the other characters it is interesting to me to find how it is that their little minds, their little thoughts can make such a terrible thing as capital punishment funny. That is the play's angle; they completely miss the immensity of the whole and focus on trivialities, which, of course, turns everything to the ridiculous."

PEPYS STAR BRITISH TO FINGERTIPS

Hytten of 'And So To Bed' Has Norweigan Name But Hails from London

No stranger to the Los Angeles stage is the nimble-tongued Olaf Hytten, who masquerades as Samuel Pepys in "And So to Bed," amusing comedy of seventeenth century naughtiness which now holds forth at the Music Box Theater.

Mr. Hytten, recently returned to these parts from England, where he has been playing in British International pictures, to join his fortunes with the Civic Repertory group at the Music Box, has appeared here with Pauline Frederick, Mary Boland, Marjorie Rambeau and Edward Everett Horton in days gone past.

He still seems a pretty youngish man. And while this, perhaps, bears no connection to the matter of his age, epigrams fall from his tongue with almost every other sentence.

"English pictures are like American gin. No matter how much you flavor them, nor how hard you try to do something with them, they are still pretty much substitutes for the real thing.

"The best and longest engagement I ever had was the war. I had five years' work without a break, except in hospitals, and without the loss of a salary check."

And so on.

Mr. Hytten, British to his fingertips, explains his Norse name and his English ways by reason of the fact that his father was a Norwegian, migrated to England.

He probably inherited some of the roving blood of the early Norse adventurers, for when he was 16 years of age he started to run away from London to go to sea. His father caught him and forthwith sent him to sea. He was put under the watchful eye of a Norwegian sailing master, instructed to give him plenty of "hidings."

"I had a hiding about every other day, so by the time the voyage was ended, I was pretty sick of sea life," Mr. Hytten comments. "I went to work at the business of selling cotton and linseed cakes.

"Somehow, I found my way into amateur theatricals. The first part I ever played was that of Sir Tobias Belch in 'Twelfth Night.'" Eric Snowden, now also of the cast of "And So to Bed," happened to be in the same cast. The two never played together again until this current engagement.

MUSIC'S SPELL SPREADS ANEW

Melody Is the All-Absorbing Topic at the Studios; Preparations for Romberg Work Notable; Samuel Goldwyn Bringing Rare Charmer of Songs to Coast

BY EDWIN SCHALLERT

MUSIC—music—music. The word grows in significance every hour in Hollywood. There is a congregation of composers coming in this direction, or already present, that is unrivaled in magnitude. At least, in the comic opera field of creation. One hears the names of the Austrian, Franz Lehar, and Oscar Straus, as being en route. Sigmund Romberg, Rudolf Friml and others who have enjoyed great American success are here.

Romberg's score for "Viennese Nights" is already almost completely rehearsed, and a unique spectacle was presented on one of the stages of the Warner Brothers' studio the past week when a full symphony orchestra, a gypsy orchestra, and a brass band were being put through their paces, not to speak of singing principals and chorus. There are episodes in this film where not less than 150 instrumentalists will be used.

What can the theater offer to equal such magnitude, and such variety, as can be involved for these musical productions? Their elaborateness can scarcely be comprehended at so early a stage. Indeed, a really new era has dawned.

THE completing and rehearsing of the full score is a meaningless step in itself, especially with the composer watching every bar of music as it is played. Readjustments can be secured in the instrumentation that will yield a higher perfection. The best results microphonically can be sought.

Romberg in his writing for this picture has endeavored to go beyond the usual limits of popularity by the introduction of a symphonic poem as a feature of the operetta. It is certainly both an ambitious and worthy effort toward the higher musicalizing of the screen, and it has a dramatic point as

DRAMA DEPRESSES ACTORS

"Journey's End" Brings Emotional Exhaustion With Every Performance

He's just 25 now, this Hugh Williams who plays the role of Capt. Stanhope in "Journey's End" at the Belasco. Just one Capt. Stanhope of the fifty-five companies which are carrying this mighty play throughout the world. It has, you know, even been translated into Japanese and Chinese.

So this young Hugh was only of grammar-school age when the alice of the war so dramatically depicted was raging . . . "My generation got very little education . . . all the 'profs' were the old and unfit. Then, too, our food was terrible . . . we were starved mentally and physically," he says, in the same quiet conversational tone that makes the exceptional outbursts in the play so terrific.

"I always knew I wanted to be an actor, so at 17 I secured my first role in a little provincial company in Wales. I'm Welsh, you know. My first role in London was a small one in 'The Yellow Jacket,' an American play. Several small parts after that, until I secured my first important role in another American play, 'The Best People' . . . that of the spoiled drunken son . . .

"This led to the part of Bunny, another spoiled, neurotic son in Shaw's 'Mesalliance' . . . that was my favorite of all to date. Of course, I am proud to have this Capt. Stanhope part in 'Journey's End' . . . but it's dreadfully depressing. Sometimes I wish those six bottles of whisky I drink every night were real," he adds with a wry smile. "You know, after most plays the actors are ready for a good time, but in this . . . well, I usually just go to bed . . . it sort of hangs on me. Funny, but after I had been on the stage a short time, I meant to go into the army when I was old enough . . . No, not now."

He is curiously old beyond his years, this boy, even as the Capt. Stanhope of the play, weighted with such frightful responsibility at 23. And he has that same quiet repressed way of talking that proves so dramatically emotional in the play. He married at 20 and his wife of five years' standing is here with him.

All the same he's a hero-worshiper . . . even as young Second-lieutenant Raleigh, whom he almost savagely condemns for it, in the play. And his eyes lighted up as he said "Oh, Charlie Chaplin is almost a god . . . I want to meet that man more than any other" . . . so it's all right, he still has some enthusiasm left. Charlie may have quite a job living up to young Hugh's ideals of him.

"No, I haven't had many interviews," he smiles presently. "They don't go in much for that sort of thing in Canada . . . we landed at Montreal and played all through Canada, you know. But in San Francisco I was interviewed twice . . . one feels sort of foolish, when all the rest of the cast are equally important . . . and when so many companies are out with fifty-four other Stanhopes as good as me."

Kolb and Dill—With Ann Cornwall
Will make merry in "Give and Take," a comedy by Aaron Hoffman, this matinee and thereafter at the President Theater, one of the Henry Duffy chain of houses.

KOLB AND DILL FIGHT ON

And Off Stage Since 1904; Pair of Comics Now in "Give and Take" at President

BY JOHN SCOTT

"Friendly Enemies" should have been written for Kolb and Dill. It describes them exactly. They have been fighting on and off the stage ever since 1904. "We were born in the same city, in houses about 100 yards apart," Kolb said. "I wouldn't have anything to do with Dill except in the amateur theatricals which we indulged in as boys. His brother was my pal, but unfortunately had no talent."

"Kolb was an ornery kid," interjected Dill. "He always has thought me crazy, and I in turn have thought him crazy for thinking me so. He is a nimrod. I never shot a gun or caught a fish in my life. Billiards is my game."

"Dill buys stocks and I buy real estate," said Kolb. "I don't know how much money he has. I've never bothered to find out, and I know good and well that he doesn't know how much I have."

So it goes with the two noted comics, who have trouped together for these many years, sharing the joys and sorrows of actors without demonstrating either emotion to one another.

Now the pair has consented to appear for Henry Duffy in "Give and Take," starting at the President Theater today. The vehicle was provided by Aaron Hoffman, and fits them perfectly. Hoffman has penned so many plays for Kolb and Dill that he has become saturated with their mannerisms; and unconsciously suits his characters to their capacities and talents.

"We have played in about eighty-seven different plays in our careers," Kolb said. "Only one has wound up in red ink. It was a good vehicle but various things conspired against its success.

"Our roles on the stage have all been built on the premise of contrariness. If Dill moves a chair to one side of the platform, I resent it immediately and want it on the opposite side. Its inherent in us. We can't agree on anything. That is, we do agree on just one matter, that is to leave each other alone. We always have had certain duties to perform in regard to our productions."

"That's right," Dill added. "Since we started I have always had charge of things from the back of the stage to the footlights. Kolb brooks no interference with anything out front, tickets, money, ushers, lighting, supplies and bookings. In this way we have managed to keep out

Marie Dressler Does Quick Right-About-Face from Role in "Anna Christie"

BY ALMA WHITAKER

Have you seen "Anna Christie" at the Criterion Theater? It's rather tremendous. And the woman who makes us laugh, shudder and despise an old drunken wharf slattern . . . and yet makes her rise to such leery heights of nobility that we want to put our arm 'round her and praise her for a sublime sacrificial heroine, is Marie Dressler.

So when we invaded her hill-top home, furnished in gay modern impudence, and reeking of fond livableness, we admonished her right away.

"Now, Marie, don't you dare tell us you are a total abstainer in real life . . . as the ladies who play wicked vamps always want to assure us they are simple innocent maidens behind the scenes who always share a bedroom with their mammas . . .

"Certainly not," beamed the irrepressible, unconquerable Marie. "But all the same . . . well, anyway, you just see me in 'The Swan' when it opens, for I am a high-born queen in that, every inch of me, even if I have sort of made a specialty of lowdown, sodden women in so many productions. I'm dignity personified. I got that chance to 'clean up' for once, through singing 'I'm a Queen' in the 'Hollywood Revue,' too . . .

"It's funny how I came to specialize in 'drunks' . . . you know there were 'drunk' songs in two of the old operettas in which I used to play, and I seemed to be the only woman who could tackle them. They left them out, when I wasn't in the show. So then I used to sing a 'drunk' song, just for my friends, which made no end of a hit. That settled me. I've been the prime woman inebriated comedienne on and off ever since.

All of which sounds quite deplorable . . . unless you have seen Marie in one of her alcoholic roles . . . and notably, that in "Anna Christie." For Marie manages to discover a streak of nobility in the lowest form of human life and, while making us laugh helplessly, also unexpectedly shames us into startled admiration as she so subtly, pitiably reveals these dazzling sacrificial streaks. She almost makes us feel

EAST PRAISES "ROGUE SONG"

Tibbett Voice, Personality Approved

"Seven Days' Leave" Called Outstanding

Wallace Direction, Cooper Acting Lauded

BY NORBERT LUSK

NEW YORK, Feb. 1. (Exclusive)—The screen debut of Lawrence Tibbett occurred Monday evening, when "The Rogue Song" opened at the Astor Theater in the presence of a packed house which included a large group of opera singers who might be said to have awaited the outcome as a possible factor in their future activities. That they were encouraged by the vocal aspects of the picture goes without saying. Mr. Tibbett's beautiful baritone came from the screen unimpaired, with such fullness, indeed, that it threatened to shatter the microphone and caused one to wish it were being heard in the Hollywood Bowl instead of a moderate-sized auditorium where, at times, the volume of sound which poured from his throat made eardrums vibrate and set nerves on edge for possible disaster. This defect was noticeable in the first Vitaphone shorts of Martinelli, Tibbett's colleague at the Metropolitan Opera. But later recordings of the same tenor have remedied it with no loss of tonal beauty, thus raising the question of the indiscretion of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in permitting their star to be heard at a disadvantage ever so slight.

In subsequent pictures the defect will obviously be overcome, if not by refinement of recording, then by Mr. Tibbett's own sense of musical values. He has a forceful, magnetic personality in keeping with his resounding tones and his acting is notable for unself-consciousness, though greater experience on the screen will be required to develop variety, warmth and subtlety. Even at present, however, his acting is exceptional merely by not being stilted and operatic, but it falls short of serious comparison with the efforts of a New York first rate player trained on the screen. Distinctly, Mr. Tibbett has a future in singing pictures, though his acceptance by the public at large is still in doubt.

STORY INCREDIBLE

All the reviews are favorable, though tempered by caution, the highlights focusing on the star rather than the picture. The latter is only moderately interesting, tastefully produced, but brilliant never, and always quite incredible save in one scene, that of bandit's murder of the prince. Staged with imagination, distinction and fine tragic feeling, this episode more than any other identifies Lionel Barrymore as the director. His hand seemed conspicuously missing from the comic relief, supplied at intervals as relief, by Laurel and Hardy. A joy in their own place, they bored as intruders in this. But Catherine Dale Owen gained enormously by association with the picture. Its Technicolor might almost be said to have been invented to reproduce a Lorelei Lee with the face of a Burne-Jones angel.

Praise without stint has been heaped upon "Seven Days' Leave," at the Paramount. From every standpoint the picture is declared outstanding . . . scenario, direction, acting, photography, dialogue . . . and no matter what the year may bring it is safely conservative to predict that it will remain among the best. Remarkable for strict adherence to the original one-act play, it is also notable for he skill and sympathy with which necessary amplification has been accomplished. There is neither a scene nor a line that Barrie might not have written, nor, indeed, a gesture, nor an inflection that one believes might not have been approved had the author supervised Richard Wallace's direction. Though the story naturally violates the accepted prescription for box-office

THEME SONG OWN EXCUSE

Melodies Need No "Logical" Introductions; Style All Important, Says Lubitsch

BY PHILIP K. SCHEUER

A fig for logic! The theme song of an operetta or a musical comedy needs no apology for existing; it is its own vindication. Where there is no logic to begin with, there need be none for theme songs. So declares Ernst Lubitsch, director of "The Love Parade," the screen's first genuine musical comedy—and he looks on with quizzical and humorous eye while half the movie makers of Hollywood are running themselves ragged to find an excuse for the "logical" introduction of melodies. It is just a matter, says Herr Lubitsch, of knowing your art form.

Herr Lubitsch calls it "style." Jotly, keen, enthusiastic, the little man who swung without a falter from the terrific drama of a "Patriot" to the sparkling improprieties of a "Love Parade" finds it good to be alive, even in a topsy-turvy cinematic world. So long as he may be true to himself, he is happy making motion pictures. Tragedy or comedy or opera—it is all one to the artist who knows his style.

"EXCUSE IT, PLEASE"

"In your drama," Herr Lubitsch began, "your denouement, your punch, is the climax of your situation. And in your musical picture your song is your climax. Why is it necessary to explain it? All the momentum you have built up in the scene is wasted while you pause to apologize. 'Excuse, please, ladies and gentlemen'—this is what you are trying to say—'but our leading man is now going to express his great love for his lady by singing about it to her!'

"And while you are saying all this your point is lost!

"An operetta is not real; it is a fairy tale peopled by romantic creatures of the imagination. It is the privilege of these creatures to make song when they like, for their song is no more unreal than they. A great dramatist once said to me, 'If you are going to place your scene in the clouds, do it!—but don't apologize!' That is what I mean by style. And the only logic you need thereafter is this: Let everything that happens in the clouds be true to the poetic fancies of such a setting."

It was in a mood of whimsical nonsense that Herr Lubitsch conceived "The Love Parade," the current delight at the Paramount Theater. How different from the somber menace of "The Patriot," that magnificent tragedy of a mad Czar in which Emil Jannings made his farewell gesture to American filmst Yet Herr Lubitsch is loath to make comparisons. "You would not compare the work of a cobbler with that of a locksmith?" he asks, shrugging, implying the vast differences in two techniques.

ALWAYS COMPROMISE

"It is this business of style, against which often makes it very difficult to produce a really fine drama," he said. "To my mind, you see, a drama is as real as an operetta is unreal; if I am portraying life for six reels I cannot change in the seventh, for then I am making a hash of the six, I am dodging consequences. I am being untrue to life. When I do so it is the same as saying: 'Excuse, ladies and gentlemen, but our players were only fooling; it is getting late, so let us kiss and make up and forget all about it.'"

Lubitsch is pleased that audiences have responded with such plaudits to "The Love Parade." Its success paves the way, he believes, for finer and more expert musical films. He himself will direct another one soon. The musical trend, he says, will be higher; he looks to see operettas like those of Offenbach made into grand sound pictures. Like others in his field, he recognizes many problems to be solved, among them the timing of situations so that their

Drama and a Musical Comedy Vary Talkie Fan's Fare

Richard Barthelmess Returns to the Orient for Inspiration; "No, No, Nanette" Becomes an Audible Film
The star of "Broken Blossoms" appears in a scene from his new picture, "A Son of the Gods," which came last midnight to Warner Brothers' Downtown Theater. At right, Staff Artist Bruce Russell shows you Bernice Claire and Alexander Gray, both of the musical "No, No, Nanette." It opens Wednesday at the Orpheum.

THEATER FOLK BLAMED FOR PESSIMISTIC TALK

Robert McWade believes that the theater is in a healthy condition. Nothing will convince the character comedian that all the wails and lamentations about the stage have any foundation. He points to the fact that producers have more successes on Broadway now than at any time in the last ten years. If he wanted to be personal, he says, he could cite the flourishing condition of "It Pays to Advertise," in which he is appearing at the Hollywood Playhouse.

"All these howls of pessimists have no real basis," asserts McWade. "The talking pictures and the stage can go forward side by side. Each is a separate art.

"One of the most interesting articles on the subject and one that expresses my own viewpoint was written recently by Randolph Hartley, well-known publicist, who said: 'After reading several thousand words about the lamentable condition of the legitimate theater, this writer is convinced that John Golden has the formula. What is chiefly the matter with the theater is that nearly everybody connected with it seems determined to impress the public with the idea that the theater is a decayed and tattered institution.

"'But the people of the theater fill the air with their lamentations. If the legitimate theater be doomed, a sinking ship which God grant it may not be, let it at least go down with colors flying.'" full humor will not be lost, and how long to pause for a laugh.

TEST OF HIS ABILITY

"Once," said Herr Lubitsch, his brow crinkling at the recollection, "I was a comedian on the stage in Berlin. It was the third part I had ever taken, and when the curtain came down I hurried to ask a veteran actor what he thought of my work.

"'Very good,' he said to me, 'but, Lubitsch, you do not show enough salary.'

"'What is that?' I asked him.

"'You should be paid more money,' he said, 'for then you would have the self-confidence and courage to pause long between your lines.'

"That is where Maurice Chevalier in 'The Love Parade' is so splendid. The right pause is half the laugh. On the stage the actor who can hold an audience for two minutes—with a pause—is a very great actor indeed."

The fine hand of Lubitsch is active in every phase of his productions. He "sits in" with his writers, working out on paper the thousand and one details which seem so spontaneous a part of each finished scene. The delicate indelicacies of "sexy" interplay delight him; they need never be offensive, he believes, unless they are "vulgar and hammering." And it is not the "style" of Ernst Lubitsch to be either.

BOYD IN CROOK ROLE

Some of the cunning that made William Boyd of the stage a hit as Sergt. Quirt in "What Price Glory," a role he created in the original, is applied to his character as the master crook in "The Benson Murder Case," Paramount's version of the S. S. Van Dine novel starring William Powell. Boyd's recent efforts were in "Those Who Dance," at First National, and "The Locked Door," booked for United Artists.

SONG ECHOES THROUGH LIFE

Music Principal Factor in Dorothy Jordan's Career; Now Is Heroine to Singing Novarro

Music has dominated the life of Dorothy Jordan, a newcomer to the talking screen, from the moment she heard her first lullaby. It has been the chief factor in her theatrical career and, it seems, will continue to be, for she recently signed a new contract as Ramon Novarro's leading lady at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios.

Love-making by music finds the young actress ready and eager to register the various emotions which it inspires. The mechanical aspects of such romance have not as yet destroyed the illusion which the melodies create.

"The long waits between songs, which are necessary to get everything ready for recording, seem to have little effect on me," Miss Jordan said. "And the recording doesn't seem mechanical, even though the music comes from the play-back which is necessary in close-ups, since the singer is not expected to sing over and over again while they are being taken."

Cameras still present the main menace for Miss Jordan. This is natural, for she still can be termed a newcomer in pictures. When the music is not playing or Novarro is not singing, she feels the camera's deadly eye.

SHE RISES RAPIDLY

Miss Jordan's first featured role is in "Devil May Care," showing currently at the Carthay Circle Theater. The young lady was born in Tennessee and educated in the South. Following a sensible course, she decided to enroll in a dramatic school in New York, and shortly after joined the chorus at the Capitol Theater.

Her rise on the stage was remarkably rapid for one so young, and soon she found herself in "Garrick Gaieties," followed by featured parts in "Twinkle, Twinkle," "Funny Face" and "The Treasure Girl."

Miss Jordan made her screen debut in "Black Magic." Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks helped her on the road to success in "Taming of the Shrew," and then Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer decided she should be on the pay roll. Officials of that studio have voiced no little approval of her talents and signed her for a long term. She has finished "House of Troy" and is starting work on "Singer of Seville."

MOVIE CROWNS BOUNCE ABOUT

not a blinding beauty. Applause these days is sounding for performance, not profile, as hear the thunder for Lawrence Tibbett and the spontaneous handclapping that greets Jack Oakie when his pan appears.

While frivolity is the most necessary commodity in the world. It wouldn't hurt to leaven Chevalier's line with a touch of seriousness. There's fact in the song he sings, "If you want me gay, then I'll be gay; if you want me serious, then I can be serious . . ." He could do "The Big Parade" as well as "The Love Parade."

NO OFFENSE

He can sing a risque ditty and even grandma will laugh because he has the quality of wholesomeness. His insinuations are too gay to be suggestive, too swift and light to be taken seriously. Of course, if you want to take them so, why then he can be serious. "Anything to please the queen . . ."

I'm not saying the talkies will knock the stage for a loop, but with "The Love Parade" in town you're not going to sit through a poor one-ring stage show. I sat as far as intermission at one the other night, but when the queen said, "Let's run over and see 'The Love Parade' again," I grabbed my hat and gurgled gallantly, "Anything to please the queen . . ."

Chevalier is saving the world safe for gallantry. At least couples aren't going to part over the question of which movie to go to.

Out, it looks like we owe another debt to France.

Chevalier, here we come!

KOHLER BATTLES AGAIN

Two-fisted Fred Kohler, battler in "Underworld," "The Showdown," "The Drag Net" and "Thunderbolt" has been awarded another menacing role, that of the villainous Stack in Zane Grey's "The Light of Western Stars," to be filmed by Paramount. Richard Arlen has the star part.

COMEDIENNE TURNS QUEEN

that one must sink to the depths before one can rise to the heights.

So no wonder this remarkable Miss Dressler, who, in 1924, wrote her autobiography—revealing how "the ugly duckling" of a family could achieve both fame and love, win two husbands, and several fortunes by being sumptuously funny rather than beautiful—can start upon a new and dazzling career in talking films at an age when most women sit back and take to their knitting. Marie's publishers are calling for another book . . . "But now it would have to called "After Fifty," smiles the author, who says that some people are old at 16, while others remain ever youthful to the end . . . if they have the precious gift of laughter.

"It is much more satisfactory to be a comedienne," says Marie. "I used to have a wonderful voice and played straight roles in forty light operas . . . and then, of course, I ruined it singing those awful 'drunk' songs. But I have no regrets. It is more worth while to make people laugh. You should see the naughty one they are planning for Polly Moran and me. They haven't named it yet but we start this week. We are two frowsy old boarding-house keepers, who are supposed to have been neighbors for thirty years . . . and Polly plays the stock-market and gets rich . . . Oh, yes, more 'drunk' scenes, of course . . . Say, you will go and see me as the dignified queen-lady in 'The Swan,' won't you?' she adds hastily.

STRAIGHT ROLE PORTRAYED

Virginia Sale, young character actress, has in "I Love You," an R.-K.-O. talkie directed by Melville Brown, her most important "straight" role, by which is meant, in theatrical parlance, a characterization achieved without noticeable make-up or costume effects. Miss Sale is well known for her abilities to portray old women, and to originate and make up for eccentric feminine types.

EAST PRAISES "ROGUE SONG"

success, the response of the public has been whole-hearted this week with every evidence of complete absorption and enjoyment, to say nothing of audible amusement at the quips of the character woman. The performance of Gary Cooper is considered perfect not only by those to whom his appeal is no longer a novelty, but by those critics who have given him faint praise in the past. It is needless to add that Beryl Mercer is likewise decorated with figurative medals for a superb characterization, together with Daisy Belmore, Nora Cecilia and Tempe Piggott, as her cronies.

NORMA SHEARER A FAVORITE

"Their Own Desire" at the Capitol has failed to garner the commendation bestowed by some of us on it, if not as a whole, then at least because of the sensitive, restrained and eloquent performance of Norma Shearer. One reviewer terms the picture flat and foolish and Miss Shearer at sea in the problems of the heroine. Others less given to drastic condemnation dismiss the picture as dull. Yet audiences at the Capitol have been excellent. The fact remains that Miss Shearer's popularity is such that she will not lose by it and will gain in some quarters. Likewise Robert Montgomery, who has caught on unusually well with the casual patron of the screen, will profit by the sensible and agreeable performance he gives as the hero.

Welcome news hereabouts is Paramount's purchase of A. H. Wood's contract with Claudette Colbert and the signing of a new one which will keep the actress on the screen for five years.

Follies Offers Unusual Show

When it comes to a question of general burlesque excellence, "Fads and Fancies," opening today at the Follies, will stand comparison with any other show presented at the theater this season, the management broadcasts. In order to bring about such a happy blend of everything expected of real burlesque, eight funny scenes are introduced by the cast of principals. Francis Parks, Sammie Ward, Wanda Devon, Eddie Marr, William Lilling, Jane Hazelton, Ruth Clemons, Billy Horan and Lillian Murray are the important members. The chorus is called an active one, consisting of forty girls.

SIXTH SENSE APPARENT IN FILM STUDIO

Workers Catch Spirit of Production Held to Be Rare Picture

Studio workers, from property men to supervisors, have a sixth sense for "feeling" a production even when it is half completed, according to a studio story. Recently National produced a special with Richard Barthlmess in the starring role. It was "Son of the Gods" now at Warner Brothers' Hollywood Theater. "Sun of the Gods" was one of those rare pictures which became the subject of emotional undercurrents in a studio.

Technicians, traditionally hard-boiled, stood behind the scene. They listened and absorbed. When the picture was finished they tiptoed away from their work, unconsciously afraid that they had just witnessed something fine. Lee Ying (played by E. Allyn Warren,) Chinese patriarch, uttered words of wisdom from Confucius and extras were careful not to miss a word. The many Chinese symbols throughout the luxurious Ying apartment cast a spell not easily dispelled.

The American boy has been raised by the Chinese under the belief that he is their son. There is a deep, intangible bond between them, the bond, inward, unfathomable as that exists between a father and son. They are about to separate, and ever since the boy as a child came into his heart he has known his father's only reason for living. Now they are to go their separate ways.

Such drama is the new Barthelmess production.

SINGER FORGETS TO WARBLE

Bernice Claire Puts Vocalization to Side for Role in Straight Dramatic Picture

It is nice to be able to sing, but it is sometimes hard to convince a producer that one can be an actress as well as a singer. Sometimes one never does, then sometimes one gets a break. Bernice Claire is one of the fortunates, for with her fourth picture she has been entrusted with a role purely dramatic without a note being sung through all its emotion.

Since she entered the picture world some six months ago, Miss Claire has been waiting for just such an opportunity, but she never hoped it would come so soon. Although she has never played a "straight" role in her life, she has felt sure she could act. Now, in "Jailbreak," she has her chance to prove it. It is also the first time in her picture experience that she feels relaxed before the camera, which is a sure sign that she is at home in her new medium.

The type of thing to which she is accustomed is the usual routine of the singing heroine. That started when she was on the stage, her career there terminating with the leading lady in "The Desert Song." It preceded her into talkies. Her first role was the title one in "No, No, Nanette," which will start romping away at the Orpheum on February 5. That was Miss Claire's initial taste of real musical comedy, having previously confined her talents to the musical operettas.

"I don't think I particularly distinguish myself as Nanette. One is often criticised for not acting in musical comedy. But it doesn't call for acting. All that is expected of musical shows is lightness, airiness and humor. It is gag comedy and you can't gag and act, too.

NO JAZZ FOR HER

"I know I don't really fit into it vocally. I like jazz. I enjoy hearing a good blues singer, but my voice is not suited to that sort of thing. I have tried to sing jazz and I can't. Somehow, I can't get those rhythms which a jazz voice must have."

In "Nanette," and "Song of the Flame," Bernice sings accompaniments with Alexander Gray. It has been very nice, for they were together in "The Desert Song," and it was really through Gray that she first came to the screen. When he made his first test in the East he asked Miss Claire to go along and act the other half of the scene with him. She did, never expecting anything to come from it. Later, when the test was shown in Hollywood, producers wanted to know who the girl was and wired her to come here and help herself to a contract. An unusually sensible girl, she did.

What Bernice anticipates is a role in which she can both sing and act. With musical pictures changing as they are, she feels that won't be long now.

"Operettas are grand to do because the story is generally fairly strong and the music much better than the average. I feel sure that pictures, now that they have had it, will never be without music. The structure will no doubt change, but it will become more improved. I don't think pictures today give even a hint of what they will be five years from now. We all have a chance now to grow up with the industry. It is much better, to be able to enter talkies now than to have entered silents three years ago. Then it was a question of ignorance lost in experience, but now we can learn while pictures are learning."

Costumed roles are those for which Miss Claire feels she is best suited. They appeal to her imagination, for to her they shed glamour around a story, furthering its romance. And, after all, what is singing, but the language of romance?

SONG HELD AT BEST IN SOUND FILM

Baritone Says Talkies Offer Public Great Art in Music

"The talking picture will enable the public to know for the first time in history, all that there is in the art of song."

So declares Lawrence Tibbett, baritone, the first major opera star to appear before the camera and microphone in a talking drama.

Tibbett is starred in "The Rogue Song," M.-G.-M.'s all-color drama of the Caucasus at Grauman's Chinese Theater. He sings six numbers ranging from "The Song of the Rogue" to love ballads.

"The first test I made," says Tibbett, "disclosed the possibilities of subtleties in song, which, on the stage, would be utterly lost. In fact, the camera and microphone literally place and singer under a microscope, which means that the most delicate inflections, lost when one has to sing across an orchestra pit and stage apron to an audience, are developed and reproduced. The dramatic actor, I think, finds much the same thing, but in song it is particularly marked. Audiences will hear singers at their best for the first time through talking pictures."

Tibbitt plays a vivid Caucasian bandit chief, heading a singing band of robbers; a sort of Russian Robin Hood, in the new picture, and sings numbers by Herbert Stothart and Clifford Gray, with interpolations by Franz Lehar.

WOMEN OF CITY HELD INDIVIDUAL

Actress Lauds Los Angeles for Cosmopolitan Type of Inhabitants

Los Angeles has lured Josephine Houston, prima donna of "The New Moon" at the Majestic Theater. She already has catalogued Los Angeles women as "very beautiful" and as having a "rich temperament" that places them in a distinctive group from women of any other part of the world.

"Los Angeles is one of the most cosmopolitan cities I have ever been in," Miss Houston says. "For here you have the New Yorker, the Bostonian, the middle westerner, the southerner and the foreign born, while New Yorkers are distinctly New Yorkers."

Miss Houston, who has made a distinct personal success in the prima donna role of the Albertson-Macloon operetta, "The New Moon," was born in Nebraska, educated in Chicago, has had established residences in Seattle, Portland and New York City. She took up vocal music when quite young and at the age of 16, sang before Mrs. Samuel Insull in Chicago, who encouraged her to continue her musical education. Her first stage appearance was in "La Boheme," which was followed by a role in "La Tosca." This was followed by a season or two in stock, a short fling in vaudeville and a single engagement in the talkies as prima donna of "On With the Show."

Vallee in Book Offers Truths About Himself

After he went to Hollywood to star in Radio Pictures' musical production, "The Vagabond Lover," coming to the R.-K.-O. Theater Thursday, Rudy Vallee had nothing to do, except work every day and many nights in the picture; keep up a fast social pace and fill many requests from theaters, night clubs and civic affairs.

Then he decided to write a story of his life.

"I majored in English at Yale," he explained, when questioned about the book, "so I might as well use that knowledge to straighten out many absurd impressions of me that have got into print.

"For instance, I am often called a song writer. I did write 'The Vagabond Lover' and 'Deep Night,' but I do not expect to write another.

"It also comes to my ears that my fan mail reached the total of 20,000 a day, and that 8000 girls proposed marriage to me. Well, I should say that 200 letters a day is more like the truth, and as for the proposals, they are things we shouldn't discuss."

Girls Feature Burbank Show

"Girls From the Moulin Rouge" at the Burbank Theater, will hold sway for one week. According to its producer, George Clark, the new bill will be a comedy vehicle for Billy (Bumps) Mack and Billy Mossey. Evelyn Myers will head the feminine contingent of the company. The chorus of forty-five will be much in evidence.

The cast will include Beatrice Franklin, a newcomer to the Burbank; June Rhoads and Virginia Jones.

Tower Offers Feature Film

"Tiger Rose," talking picture featuring Monte Blue and Lupe Velez, is now playing at the Tower Theatre.

"Tiger Rose" is described as a colorful and exciting melodrama.

Gaston Glass, Grant Withers and Tully Marshall support Blue and Miss Velez.

NIPPONESE TO APPEAR FOR WEEK

Musical Drama Booked for Figueroa Playhouse the 10th Inst.

The forthcoming engagement of Tsutsui and his celebrated troupe of Nipponese players in "Samurai and Geisha," three-act musical drama, the week of the 10th inst., at the Figueroa Playhouse, marks another step in the promotion of friendly theatrical relations between the United States and Japan.

A recent gesture of good will from this direction was the visit of Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks to Tokio and Yokohama, where they were greeted with enthusiasm and accorded several brilliant receptions.

Proving that Japanese actors can make good in American films, Sojin, noted character player featured by Samuel Goldwyn in "The Devil Dancer" and since established as a popular favorite in First National productions, is now on a personal appearance tour in his native land and is meeting with sensational success. Sojin, incidentally, played for many years in Tsutsui's company at the Dontonbori and Gifu theaters in Osaka.

Michio Ito, who is staging "Samurai and Geisha" under the auspices of the Japanese Theater Association, is the connecting link as a producer between Japan and America.

The local booking of "Samurai and Geisha," at the Figueroa Playhouse is for one week only.

REVOLUTION DEPICTED IN STAGE PLAY

Pasadena Production of Russian Rebellion Held to Be Startling

"The Armored Train," which had its American premiere at the Pasadena Community Playhouse last Thursday evening, is declared to be attracting widespread comment not only for its startling picture of the Russian revolution, but also its spectacular beauty.

The eight scenes in Vsevold Ivanov's drama furnish a panoramic picture of the Russia of the revolution of 1917. First, the aristocracy with its luxury and futile dreams; then a swift change to the lonely seashore for the concentration of forces, the calm before the human maelstrom. In the third scene at the railway station gather the different elements, moving shadows in an excited psychological mass; then on to the tower and roof of a church, the people fleeing from their burning village with Vershinin, the peasant leader, played by Gilmor Brown, taking charge. From here the movement centers about the "armored train" sent to put down the uprising and the peasant resistance, a railway embankment, the tower of the armored train, a lonely hiding place where spies are shot, and then the close in the depot factory.

Janis Muncis, winner of the Grand Prix at Paris in 1925, and former director of the Art Theater at Riga, where he produced "The Armored Train" before he became associated with Gilmor Brown at the Pasadena Playhouse, is responsible for the accuracy of this production.

Using a new method of projection of scene, Muncis painted the settings for each of these scenes to be thrown on curtains, a method much used in Europe and permitting each act to be a complete painting and picture.

BROTHER VS. BROTHER IN FILM STORY

"Dark Streets" to Feature Twins' Lives as Crook and Policeman

According to Georges Lavriller, considered a French authority on the narrative form, in his treatise on dramatic themes, the brother-against-brother angle is one of the three most powerful in the entire gamut of story telling.

In "Dark Streets," the newest First National-Vitaphone feature starring Jack Mulhall, which is being shown at the R.-K.-O. Theater, this theme is made doubly effective because the brothers are twins.

The cord binding these two against the separating influences of a civilised community so fuses the narrative entirety of "Dark Streets" that it promises to be one of the most absorbing productions of recent date. Mulhall plays both roles and is said to render the finest characterizations in his career as the twin brothers—one a crook and the other a police officer.

"Dark Streets" was directed by Frank Lloyd from the short story by Richard Connell. It was adapted to the screen by Bradley King. Jack Mulhall has been given an excellent supporting cast, including Lila Lee in the feminine lead, and important roles by Pat Harmon and Aggie Herring.

Material for George Choos's musical revue, "Odds and Ends," which is the R.-K.-O. vaudeville stage attraction, was contributed by George Gershwin, William K. Wells and other well-known composers and librettists. It features Sidney Marion. Also in the ensemble are Chic Kennedy, Kathryn Irwin, Leonard Sillman, Karen and Xande, Billy Gibson, the Harmony Trio and the twelve auditorium girls.

"Hallelujah" Tale of South

With original negro spirituals and songs put into stirring scenes, "Hallelujah," Metro-Goldwin-Mayer's talking drama of the South, is the feature attraction at the Westlake Theater today only. The new production, directed by King Vidor, is an intimate drama of the lives of the southern negroes.

DANCE CHANGE ADVOCATED

Authority Declares Time Ripe for Art to Become Intellectual Rather Than Mechanical

BY MARY MAYER

"It is high time that dancing becomes intellectual."

Such were the words of Mme. Albertina Rasch, eminent authority on dancing and dancers, as she discussed the new problems confronting the terpsichorean artists of today.

"Dancing has too long been a mechanical something—a series of meaningless motions—a set of routine steps," she said. "The time has come for it to be freed, to be a thing of the mind as well as a thing of the body. Not that every dance should have a story," she hastened to add, "but every motion should express intellect, an intelligent thought or gesture."

PORTIA GRAFTON

Mme. Rasch, by the way, is concentrating most of her efforts on staging ballets for the talking pictures. She was brought here originally, in company with her girls, to arrange dance numbers for the prologue of "Broadway Melody," which enjoyed a lengthy run at the Chinese Theater. Following the prologue engagement, the Rasch ballet appeared in several film productions, among them the "Hollywood Revue of 1929."

It was the youth and attractiveness of her girls that first won attention to her work. All perfect in figure and step, Mme. Rasch's line across the stage does not vary three inches in measurements.

Trained in Russian ballet and Viennese opera, the ballet mistress has developed a strict sense of military discipline which she carries over into the work of her troupe, in, what some aver, an "inhuman manner." Uniformity is her code—and the least departure from this in the work of her girls calls for a complete repetition of the number. During the filming of a current picture, Mme. Rasch had a ballet photographed fifteen times before it received her official stamp of approval. Her work in Hollywood has been, primarily, in revue pictures requiring classical ballets.

"The day of the artist with a faultless, mechanical technique is gone," according to Mme. Rasch. It is the thought or the idea expressed in motion that counts.

CAMERA AIDS MOVE

That this is gradually being brought about by the talking pictures, is one of her assertions.

"Everything must have a meaning for the camera," Mme. Rasch explained. "The technical whirls and twirls of the ballet mean little from a picture point of view. They are too rapid for the camera to catch—they lose much of their effectiveness when presented upon the flat surface of a screen. For the camera things must be slow in motion. Where before, a performer need think of nothing but the intricate choreography of his number, today he must visualise the picture each of his moves is creating. The line, the curve, the minutest ripple of a drape, have all become major issues.

"In other words the dancer has become 'pose conscious,'" she continued. "It has, however, reacted as an aid rather than a detriment. The contortionistic gymnastics which, in the past few years have masqueraded under the guise of dancing, will soon be eliminated entirely. Every-day dancing will become more a thing of the mind, the intellect. The talking picture has evolved this new technique. It has been created solely for the lens and the microphone. It is a technique of the plastic—or group effect."

DANCING HELD DUTY

But dancing is not only an art—at least such are Mme. Rasch's assertions. It is a duty to the health of mind and body.

An air of personal triumph always crowns the dancer. Her walk, her appearance, all bespeak the poise and charm won only through perfect health. Everything she does is accomplished with a physical economy which puts to flight the poisons of fatigue. This, naturally enough, tends toward a perfect condition of the mind, never handicapped by the inhibitions of depressed spirits. Dancing is a stimulus, and it serves to stimulate its follower in anything she may undertake.

Mme. Rasch also attributes the feat of character building to her art, inasmuch as every interval in a classic dance, regardless of how brief, is marked by a return to an erect, uplifted pose—the dance symbol of aspiration.

Mme. Rasch has recently returned from the East and is now directing a number of ballets for the new Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer release, "Revue of 1930." Portia Grafton appears as premiere ballerina in the Rasch ballets.

Selection of Dancers for Unit Started

The selection of dancers for a unit of sixteen girls will begin this week at the Earle Wallace Studios of Stage Dancing, according to an announcement just issued by Earle Wallace. Every applicant will be given equal consideration whether they have received their dance training from Earle Wallace or from any other recognized school or teacher. This unit will be used immediately at one of the leading motion-picture studios in Hollywood following a short rehearsal period. Contracts have already been signed and rehearsals will begin as soon as the selection of the dancers has been made.

Applicants will have to be five feet four inches high and will be selected for their beauty, and may be either blondes or brunettes. They must also be thoroughly trained in ballet, acrobatic and tap dancing.

Anna Pavlowa Opens Season on Continent

News comes from Europe that Anna Pavlowa recently embarked upon her season with an engagement in London. She will follow this with two weeks on the South coast and plans to open her tour in Spain. After programs in Switzerland, Germany and Scandinavia, her appearance will culminate with a season in Paris.

Many of the artists of the late Diaghileff Ballet have been engaged as members of Pavlowa's company, among them Mme. Dubrovska who appeared here with Michael Mordkin. A number of the new dances to be presented by the popular ballet artiste in her 1930 season are the compositions of Mme. Nijinska. Latest reports favor the rumor that Pavlowa is contemplating another tour to America.

MOTHERS' TEAS PROVE VALUABLE FEATURES

An interesting feature of the Lytell Studio of the Dance is the Mothers' Teas, given monthly by the Misses Velma and Selma Lytell. At this time pupils, who have made the greatest progress during the month are given an opportunity to appear before the mothers and their friends. The plan has proven a spur to many of the youngsters who look forward and work toward the goal of appearing at the afternoon gathering. The Misses Selma and Velma Lytell feature all types of dancing in their studio, with special classes devoted to children from 3 to 5 years of age.

BOLM TO OPEN STUDIO

For the first time in his long career, Adolph Bolm has consented to come to Los Angeles for a four weeks' term of dancing instruction at the request of many interested in that form of art. The Norma Gould School of the Dance is taking registrations for both class and private instruction. Classes in ballet, toe, classical, character and other forms of dancing, with a special class in dramatic pantomime for screen work is being offered.

Adolph Bolm

Mr. Bolm has been for many years noted as a ballet master both in America and Europe. He was with the Imperial Ballet in Petrograd, and has toured America with the Diaghileff Ballet Russe and the Chicago Civic Opera Company. He was ballet master at the Metropolitan Operahouse, and for the Chicago Allied Arts Association, and is now chairman pro tem of the dance committee for the entertainment features of the World's Fair to be held in Chicago in 1933.

Mr. Bolm staged "Coq d'Or" and "Petroushka" at the Metropolitan, the fascinating "Birthday of the Infanta" at the Chicago Opera, and many ballets with his own organization, but has been too busy to tour for the past several years.

Study Class in Ballroom Work Starts

Nat King, director of the Professional Dance Studio, which recently moved to its new quarters at 215 West Ninth street, announces a ballroom department has been added to the dance curriculum of the school. Under the direction of Miss Bessie Clark a ballroom dance class for high school students will begin next Friday at 7 p.m.

Miss Clark brings with her a staff of assistant teachers, who will instruct in her methods of ballroom dancing to adult students desiring private instruction. There will be gentleman instructors for the women and women will instruct gentlemen in the ballroom art.

Popular Step Scores With Collegiates

Elisa Ryan announces that she is teaching the "Prep Step," the new ballroom dance which Nancy Carroll and Stanley Smith featured in the motion-picture "Sweetie." This dance, according to Miss Ryan, has become the most popular ballroom dance among high school and college students. She is giving the instruction to the collegiate class which meets every Wednesday night at the Elisa Ryan School of Dancing.

Miss Ryan also announces a women's class every Tuesday in limbering, stretching and tap dancing at 11 a.m.

A class for business girls is held every Monday and Wednesday evening in all forms of dancing.

STANDING CHORUS OF DANCERS CONTRACTED

Reports from R.-K.-O. studio state that a standing chorus of twenty-eight girls has been placed under permanent contract and always on call. When more girls are needed for ensemble numbers they are drafted from the studio casting list.

SHYLOCK TOLL IN PICTURES

Paramount Requires Rigid Canvass of Weight, Height and Age Limits

Motion-picture studio dancing demands its pound of flesh.

A survey of girls working under the Paramount banner shows strict requirements. In the matter of age, for instance. Sixteen is the minimum number of years and twenty is the maximum.

The tall, statuesque type of girl seems definitely out of the picture, as height limitations show all the chorus between five feet, two inches and five feet, four inches.

There is also only ten pounds difference in weight between the smallest and the largest girl, the range being 105 pounds to 115 pounds.

Shoe lasts show a variation of from size 2½ to 4.

EVERYBODY'S DOING IT— PREP STEP SCORES HIT

New Dance Described

Hey! Hey! Here comes the "Prep Step."

Originated for the Lasky production of campus life, "Sweetie," the "Prep Step," as danced by Helen Kane and Jack Oakie, has won an unbelievable popularity. Everybody's doing it—according to the latest lock-in at prep-school proms. Even the collegiate brothers and sisters of the family are inclined to stamp a sophisticated mark of approval upon the latest swerves and glides of their under-classmen.

Below are sketches and illustrations of the routine. The boy starts with the right foot, the girl with the left. The toe is tapped on floor with heels up. The heel is then tapped, followed by the toe.

A step and a kick forward, the boy on the right foot and the girl on the left, is next in line. The drag stamp follows this kick step—boy on right, girl on left. The bodies are bent foreward to the extreme.

This leads into the "falling down step." The boy's right foot and the girl's left foot kick inside, then out. Two steps on each foot, the boy walking forward, the girl backward, constitutes the "Prep Walk," illustrated in drawing No. 4. The "Prep Walk" is finished by a slide, dip and a kick coming at the offbeat of the music.

The final sequence of the dance requires that partners both step with the right foot in opposite directions, kicking left foot in back. This step is reversed by standing on left foot and kicking right foot back.

The "Prep Step" is the creation of Earl Lindsay, formerly dancing instructor for Dillingham and Paramount choreographer, and is one of the dances which bids to make Hollywood the future home of ballroom-dance creations.

ELOCUTION'S STAR SETS

Dramatic Academies Set New Standards for Both Professional and Amateur Scholars

Elocution is dead. No longer does little Bobby recite in a squeaky tenor the sad, sad tale of the "Boy on the Burning Deck," nor little sister lisp in babyish prattle that epic poem, "Little Miss Muffet."

Things have changed since the talking picture invaded Hollywood—and the change has come especially to those places adjacent to the film capital.

Elocution is dead—and in its place is "dramatic reading." "The Boy Stood on the Burning Deck," as well as "Little Miss Muffet," still exist, but each is rendered in the best principles of voice and diction, with long "a's" the accepted rule, even for youngsters.

Los Angeles and Hollywood have gone in for drama schools, more perhaps, in the last few years than ever before. The dramatic academy has become a vital issue, not only for the children but for their parents as well.

STANDARDS RAISED

With the introduction of the sound screen, standards of speech have been raised. A pleasing voice, clarity of diction, and correct pronunciation held to be not only assets but requisites in the present-day school and business world.

Since the proverbial "demand" always creates a "supply," speech experts have rallied to Los Angeles and Hollywood until today there are more competent speech experts in the southern portion of California than, perhaps, in any other part of the world.

Just as the dancing schools have turned to specialization, so the dramatic academies have adopted the specialty policy. Their departments cater to requirements ranging from correction of speech impediments to training for the stage.

One of the most interesting phases in the local schools of dramatic art, is the class devoted to business men. Here they may learn all of the tricky little intricacies embodied in an after-dinner or impromptu speech—say nothing of the "pep talks" for office workers. This angle is a new one, typical of the field these academies are covering. The various schools including this course in their curriculum are reporting classes of record enrollments.

FIRM FOUNDATION

Dramatic art for children has always been popular, but never before have youngsters received the firm foundation for better speech and expression than they are receiving at present.

With this new method of teaching dramatic art, has come a demand for students to work on both stage and screen and the dependable background of the modern dramatic academy has not escaped the notice of various professional concerns. While many of the students enrolled are already well up the ladder of fame, still other unknowns are being discovered everyday from this source.

TALENT OF NEOPHYTES DEVELOPED

Hamill Studios Work to Promote Latent Ability by Private Classes

The purpose and ideals delineated for the classes and private pupils of the Katherine Hamill Studios are said to be those designed to promote the latent abilities of the pupils through the most expert and efficient teaching.

KATHERINE B. HAMILL

"Voice is nature's medium of communication of thought from man to man," says Miss Hamill, "and is the highest human faculty. Therefore the voice should be equal to any form of communication. Some believe that the business man or woman does not require specially trained voice and delivery for his line of work, yet there is not a man or woman in the business world who does not need a pleasing voice as a prerequisite for success. The business man uses public speaking daily. If he lacks the ability to express his thought adequately he is in that extent a failure. Clear tone, projected and perfectly articulated syllables convey one's point of view and this coupled with his emotion or spirit of truth convinces."

Katherine Hamill is offering special courses in voice, diction and public speaking.

Young Dancer Turns Again to Footlights

Lina Basquette has returned to Broadway. The piquant Los Angeles dancer, who four years ago was the prima ballerina in the Ziegfeld Follies, is appearing this week as the headline attraction at the R.-K.-O. Palace in the metropolis.

Her return to Broadway is a surprise to the local film colony as it was thought she was firmly entrenched in Hollywood. To her friends, however, she made it known that the lure of the footlights was again calling and she hoped to be starred in a new musical show in New York by early fall. Her new act is called "Lina Basquette and her Hollywood Steppers." This week is her second at the Palace.

Despite her seemingly long career on the stage, Miss Basquette is just 22 years of age. At 17 she was a star of the Follies. She is the daughter of Ernest Belcher, head of the local dance school of his own name. It was under Belcher that she received all of her training as a dancer.

In the last two years Miss Basquette was featured in Cecil De Mille's "Godless Girl" and other Pathe productions.

Duncan Will Discuss Cult

The arrival in this country of Raymond Duncan, brother of Isadora Duncan, has resulted in a decided stir among those interested in the individualistic viewpoints of the famous dancer. Duncan is to give a series of lectures on the Duncanian Cult. His arrival here marks the first sight of his native land in twenty years.

TANGO TO BE REVIVED FOR BRITISH PUBLIC

One of the interesting dance items from abroad states that the tango, which is one of the most popular dances on the continent, is to be revived and given a chance in London. While the British haven't taken especially to this popular number, reports state that one of the leading London hotels has recently engaged an orchestra which makes tango music a specialty.

PREMIERE BALLERINA PLAYING IN NEW YORK

The London company of "Wake Up and Dream," formerly of the London Pavillion and now playing at the Selwyn Theater, New York, boasts the premiere ballerina of the original London production, Tilly Losch. This marks Miss Losch's second visit to the States.

LYNWOOD FARNUM AT IMMANUEL CHURCH

Lynwood Farnum, a Canadian organist who has earned fame in the United States, will play at Immanuel Church on Wednesday evening under the auspices of the S. C. Guild of Organists. The concert will attract a large public interest, as he is one of the finest organ players in the world.

DRAMATIC COACH WEDS

On January 8, last, Miss Enrica Clay Dillon, eldest daughter of the late Judge Henry C. Dillon and Florence H. Dillon, was married in New York City to the writer Stanley Olmsted. Fannie Charles Dillon, composer, is a sister of Enrica Dillon.

Stanley Olmsted, who is the music and art critic for the Times-Herald of Washington, D. C., is known for his novels and short stories.

GERMANS EVOLVE NEW A

Revolt Declared to be Bringing About Only National Dance in Existence Today

Russia and America revolted against the ballet—but this resulted in no new system. In the last few years Germany has revolted—but their revolt is bringing about the only true ballet in existence today, a dance whose technique may be recognized as the forerunner of all dancing sprung.

It was the characteristic thoroughness of the German that first started this new art on its way. Today Rudolph Von Laban, one of the leaders of the movement, is perfecting a written symbolism of choreography which will enable dances to be read as music is read.

A series of simple arm extensions, plus five positions of the feet and legs, constitute the form from which all ballet steps and routines evolve. This may be compared with the six prime positions of the new German dancing, each position encompassing the entire body. In ballet it is necessary to turn the knee and hip outward to obtain balance for such intricate gyrations as the "attitude," the "arabesque" and the "pirouette," which, of course, results in a more or less rigid posture of the torso. To this, the German school is waving its arms in horror, since all ten of their commandments center around the one word, "flexibility."

That the spirit of this German school is modern in every sense of the word is undisputed. It is slightly skeptical and more intellectual than emotional. Both beauty and ugliness are held a part of the art—with ugliness, perhaps, having a bit the upper hand in an effort to believe that "ugliness in life can be surmounted by making an art of it."

It is the macabre aspect of ugliness, rather than the grotesque, however, that holds sway. The dance is described as being "mechanistic, in that its designs are angular; a series sometimes of postures in staccato, often rather static and without flow."

The most revolutionary tendency of the German school, however, is its utter disregard for the light, fluffy quality usually associated with ballet. The beruffled creature who leaped high in the air, much as one would bounce a rubber ball, has disappeared completely. In her place is a sombre spectre, whose every step echoes and re-echoes—like the ceaseless beat of a tom-tom.

A large percentage of the latest German choreographies have been written for performance in mask—another feature which tends to heighten the weird effects of this new terpsichorean venture.

The dance is changing. Reports from Europe state that some of the remaining members of the old school are banding together in an effort to stem this tide of realism which is sweeping over dance circles of the country.

But just as music lost much of its melody in a maze of modern tone combinations—so dancing is losing some of its beauty, in an effort to emerge a truer, and finer interpretation of the art.

But drama itself re... ...ains essentially unchanged, ac...ording to Dr. George Pierce Ba... ...ker, director of the University ...Theater at Yale, speaking before ...the Friday Morning Club at their ...last meeting on "American Drama ...since 1900."

STUDENTS OF DR. BAKER

The morning session and the one ...luncheon time brought out celeb... ...ities connected with the theatrical ...world such as seldom gather even ...in this erudite and arts-loving club, ...Mrs. Sarah Bixby Smith presided ...over both sessions. An interesting ...feature of the day was, that of the ...seven speakers or more, including ...Mrs. Smith herself, everyone had ...been at some time a student of Dr. ...Baker. Predominating were those ...who write for the theater and the ...motion pictures.

...In spite of the unchangableness ...of drama itself, Dr. Baker illustrated ...the great change that may come ...over it in the medium of the drama. ...Using as his object lesson the ...well-worn old play "The Second ...Mrs. Tanqueray," by Sir Arthur Pin... ...ero, which even the critics of New ...York twenty-five years ago said was ...suitable only for France, but not ...the United States. That the situ... ...tion of a man of birth and breed... ...ing marrying a woman of question... ...able reputation never happened ...here, Dr. Baker quoted the review... ...ers as saying:

"Have brushed aside farces such ...as had been popular in the decade ...just ended and in a well-built play ...about a soul in agony because of ...its own preparation for the inevit... ...able fate," and Dr. Baker intimated that when he first taught ...from this play was read almost in ...every instance because of its frankness.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENT

"...my students come to me and ...say if I really ever cared for the ...play. It is as dull, they say, and ...I am in a gentle mood I admit ...that my taste in it is mid-Victorian. ...These young people regard the play ...merely as a historical document of ...interest.

...In a similar way, he drew com... ...parisons for plays of Henry Arthur ...Jones, Masefield, Galsworthy. Of ...George Bernard Shaw, he said: ...'I like Shaw. But Shaw's chil... ...dren in drama writing and his ...children I detest. I had ...to live with them so long."

...That was just before the World ...War. Now Dr. Baker says the whole ...trend of American drama lies with ...the young playwrights of today. He ...took a magnificent defense of ...Eugene O'Neil.

"They call him a poseur. They ...say he uses tricks and devices ...merely to catch attention. I re... ...ject this. Such statements are ex... ...tremely unfair," and the au... ...thor amplified this by saying that ...many of the actors speaking the ...lines were expressing the thoughts ...of the same time as in "Strange ...Interlude," was not O'Neil's pos...

"He had to unpack the souls of ...his characters with words.

"To do it in this sort of dis... ...guise as Shakespeare unpacked the ...soul of Hamlet by soliloquy." And ...the author ended by saying:

"Drama is not dying. It is ...changing, yes. But change means ...hope for this art beloved of all ...of us. We older writers are ...passing. We have been through ...the war. But youth already ...is starting to bring out in drama ...something incomparably finer than ...anything we have had before. And ...America will give to the world the ...best. The sound pictures are go... ...ing to contribute to this great de... ...velopment of superiority."

STUDENTS WORKING HERE

...Many of his students now working ...prominent in the writing de... ...partment for sound pictures were ...mentioned. They were an inter... ...esting demonstration of Dr. Baker's ...statement.

...William Robson of Paramount, ...also coming to disclaim any art ...in sound pictures demonstrated by ...his remarks that after all there ...is an art of a new kind in even ...talking pictures which, as he said, ...was written for truck drivers and ...shop girls.

"Intelligent people may not like ...talking pictures. In fact, every one ...will say that you do not like ...them. Why, you don't ...know where you are going. Sound ...pictures are here to stay. We write ...for the 20,000,000 shop girls ...and truck drivers in the United ...States and we don't care whether ...you come to see them or not. To ...those of you who will at home read ...Shakespeare, or even ...Barrie, there are thousands ...who will come to see 'Betty's ...Husband' if Clara Bow is in it and ...to hear Clara Bow talk. But ...I suppose that everything that ...is played in the Elizabethan age ...will find its way into print, or was ...printed. And so today out of ...the talkies will come the great ...foundation for future generations ...to hear.

"...masterpieces do come out" ...Robson mentioned "Disraeli" as an ...outstanding example of such a mas... ...terpiece, which he put in the ac... ...ademic class, and somebody added ...to that all "Disraeli" is way up ...there at the top for its box-office draw... ...ing power; that shop girls and truck ...drivers were crowding to hear and ...see it, and perhaps after all while ...Mr. Robson are writing ...for the young girls they are also writing ...for Friday Morning Club members.

LUNCHEONS HIGHLIGHTS THIS WEEK

President's and Annual Poetry Section Events Set by Los Angeles Ebell

Two luncheons, to take place Tuesday and Wednesday, are highlights of the first week in February for Los Angeles Ebell.

The first, with Mrs. Thorwald Probst as curator and hostess, is the annual luncheon of the poetry section. Her long program of distinguished speakers includes Samuel Clover, editor of Los Angeles Saturday Night, who is the author of three novels and several volumes of poetry; Marshall Breeden, author of "The Romantic Southland of California!" Leroy McLeod, author of a new book of poems; Miss Beulah May, sculptor and poet; Clara Greening Creager, curator of Press Club poets; Pierre de la Roche, versatile young artist who interprets poetry in the medium of the dance; Ralph Waldo Trine, Mrs. Guy Bush and John Steven McGroarty.

Wednesday, Mrs. A. Bennett Cooke is to preside over the president's luncheon, when the speaker will be W. S. Van Dyke, director with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, who has just returned from eight months in the African jungles, filming "Trader Horn." GATES OPEN TO WOMEN IN FINANCE

Interest in Stock Market Provides New Occupations for Fair Sex

Things financial have taken the women of America by storm.

The ticker has replaced the bridge score card. Ping pong, Kam-ra and even anagrams are giving up to the charms of the brokerage office. It's an outmoded dowager that can't discuss authoritatively the significance of the market slump, or the future of Wall street.

MRS. INEZ JACKSON WELLING

With amazing rapidity, branch offices exclusively for women are springing up in Los Angeles as well as upon the eastern coast. And, as is customary with every similar trend, new occupations for women are rapidly becoming available.

An article in the current number of a well-known woman's magazine credits Los Angeles already as having seven women brokers, while many other firms are employing keen business women to handle the accounts of their women clients. One of the most prominent of these, in Los Angeles, is Mrs. Inez Jackson Welling.

Mrs. Welling, in addition to her brokerage and banking experience, has presented Milton C. Work and Robert F. Foster over the western slope, besides promoting and directing publicity for other national bridge events. She holds a bachelor of arts degree from Wells College, with additional credit in the graduate schools of the University of Chicago and the University of California. She also is president of the Wells Club of Southern California.

SANTA MONICA BAY MUSIC

The Santa Monica Bay Music Association presented its chorus and orchestra, under the direction of Hans Linne, in its annual concert on Sunday, the 26th inst., at the Municipal Auditorium in Ocean Park. The large attendance and the enthusiasm with which the program was received testified to the popularity of this yearly activity of the association. Assisting the chorus and orchestra were Sol Babitz, violinist, and the Bohemian Quartet.

HOSTESS NAMED

Mrs. W. S. James of 321 Shatto Place, will be hostess to the Ladies' Auxiliary of the McKinley Home at 2 p.m., Wednesday, the 5th inst., when a business meeting will be conducted.

LINCOLN EVENT SCHEDULED

Taking the place of the usual "comradeship" luncheon of the Schubert Wa-Wan Club, the second Wednesday of each month, the February event, Wednesday, the 12th inst., coming on the birthday anniversary of Abraham Lincoln, will be a Lincoln breakfast at 12:30 p.m. in the Biltmore.

Mrs. A. P. Eimquist, chairman, is making these affairs a "get-together and get-acquainted" time for the club. At the coming event members and guests will meet the new vice-president, Mrs. Frances Stults Campbell.

Judge Guy P. Bush, taking as his subject, "The Perfect Tribute," will pay homage to the Great Emancipator, while of much interest also will be the presentation of David K. Richards, one of the two living men who were in the Ford Theater the night Lincoln was assassinated. He will give a poignant account of that occasion. Mrs. Guy P. Bush is program chairman.

During the afternoon program following the breakfast, Dr. William Carter, religious worker among the negroes of Southern California, will speak on "The Music of the Negro." Florence Cole Talbert, a foremost colored soprano, both in America and in Europe, where she is a concert favorite, will sing, accompanied by Mrs. Bush.

Mrs. Ralph Waldo Buckman, president, will preside over the program, and will be official hostess for the breakfast. Mrs. C. B. Strohm is hospitality chairman, and will be assisted by Mmes. Madie Meade Searing, John Wangerin, Emily Reick, Frank Maginnis, Lillian Blackstone Wilson, C. Clark Patchin, Suzanne Joyce Spear, Pannie Dillon, Maj. Whittingham and C. F. Stamps.

LUNCHEON GIVEN MEMBERS

Given especially to honor nine honorary members, the midseason luncheon of the Euterpe Opera Reading Club, taking place Tuesday in the Fiesta Room of the Ambassador, was a gala affair with many notables of the musical world in attendance.

At the speakers' table, over which Mrs. Lillian K. Floyd presided, were Carrie Jacobs Bond, Mary Carr Moore, Mme. Ellen Beach Yaw, Mrs. Elmer G. Mansfield, Daisy Bannerman Coats, Charles Wakefield Cadman, L. E. Behymer and Roland Paul, musical director. Other honorees included Jean Harlow, leading lady for "Hell's Angels," recently completed air picture, and her mother, Mrs. Jean Harlow, and 18-year-old James Requa, protége of Mr. Paul. Mayor Porter, who had been scheduled as speaker, was unable to be present, but was represented by Mrs. Porter and her sister, Mrs. Moody.

That the day of "tin pan alley" is past, was the message brought by Mr. Cadman, who, after six months in the talking picture field, contends that the movies will soon make the entire country "opera minded."

Behymer, paying tribute to the accomplishments of Euterpe along the same line, declared, "As pathfinders, you're the best little bunch of musical Lindbergh's that I know."

Decorations, as arranged for the event by Mrs. Walter C. Burke, were exceptionally lovely, being of purple stock, orange marigolds and maidenhair fern, while at each place was a tiny bouquet of violets. Mrs. J. C. Fergusson was chairman for the day.

Art and Artists

PAINTING and SCULPTURE
GRAPHIC and APPLIED ARTS

THREE TALENTED SISTERS

Esther, Helen and Margaret Bruton, Californians, Impress by Intelligence of Their Art

BY ARTHUR MILLIER

Last Wednesday morning, during The Times Forum hour broadcast over KHJ, we gave the second of a series of biweekly talks on art. Our aim in this series is to present the simple problems of art as they occur in every-day living. It is impossible to reproduce these talks on this page as they call for a space that is not available.

But though they were undertaken with some misgiving we are finding these talks an excellent opportunity to clarify our conceptions about the simple bases of art in life, the home and its other general application. It is our intention to gradually lift the plane of these discussions to the point where they can include simple expositions of the place of the fine arts in contemporary life.

SOME years ago a screen by Margaret Bruton, by virtue of its imaginative power and decorative color, made many of the neighboring paintings in an exhibition at the Los Angeles Museum appear anemic. We have heard of her occasionally and a word or two of her sisters, Esther and Helen. Now, at the Little Gallery of Bullock's Wilshire, we are shown the full range of the art of these gifted sisters from Monterey.

The showing consists of paintings and drawings by Margaret, decorative screens in silver and gold, wood engravings and drypoints by Esther and wood-block prints by Helen, and its immediate impress is on the score of the intelligence, order and clarity of style and craftsmanship displayed in the work of each of the sisters.

Here is an art exhibition which must make its appeal directly to one's sense of design. The wit of Esther, the broader humor of Helen and the serious interest Margaret evidently takes in the Pueblo Indians she paints, are all staked on clean, modern methods of working, on colors or tones that are definite, steering clear of any borderland of sentimental haze that might put over works less soundly conceived.

Collectively and individually, the sisters triumph, and it is no surprise to learn that the exhibition goes directly from Bullock's to the Daus Galleries in New York, where intelligent and witty modern work finds a ready reception. Thus the layman need not be scared out by the word "design." We heard one visitor say of Margaret's painting of a window with cactus plants that "she had never seen such a real window in a picture," and this from a woman one would have expected to say, "I just can't see this crazy modern art."

Margaret has many portraits of Indians worked out in clear design and strong simple tones. Her charcoal drawings of the same sitter are particularly impressive. She has also one landscape typical of Southern California, using Southland elements that the more "pictorial" painter—who founds his pictures generally on tradition—would reject as smacking of the picture postcard. It is just such a scene as one may see near Foothill Boulevard, a red-earth drive-way, peppers, palm trees and a snowy mountain for background. Banal, in a postcard it triumphs here through good organization.

Esther is the delicate craftsman of the set. Not the wood block for her, but the more sharply incised white-line wood engraving. In these she shows us the people of the Pueblo, the Mexican jury who are discussing the case as the nonchalant murderer smokes in the sun outside the courtroom, or the churches of New Mexico with their charming lines. Still more delicate are her drypoints of the circus where she reveals an exquisite line put to the service of humor and character and a thoroughly clear, modern sense of form.

Her screens are not the full color screens of Margaret, but are intelligent adaptations of Hopi painting on panels of gold and silver. The figures of men, horses and dogs are individually delightful in their drawing. The wittiest of the screens, however, is decorated with people of the circus drawn in black line on silver.

Helen's contribution is numerically small but her style, in the few wood blocks shown, is bold, clear and full of humor. What could be funnier than the child in the train who obviously embarrasses a stranger man by calling him "Daddy." And what a delightful form is that of the man's head and hat. "The Cable Car" catches the humor of strangers swayed by a common jerk of the car, who realize the common force that moves them yet cling all the harder to their individualities.

The high average of these California girls' work, the clarity of their style, is a real influence on the side of intelligence in Pacific Coast art. There is nothing theoretical about what they are doing; it is as pleasant to laymen as to artists or critics. But the intelligence with which they order the material and the excellence of their craftsmanship puts them on the side of the light.

SMASHING water colors is the only expression that fits those by John Whorf of Boston, in company with the more thoughtful and lyrical water colors of Elizabeth Spaulding, at the Los Angeles Museum. Whorf has the bold, broad washes of deep pure color that every water colorist longs to be master of and so few can handle.

He may be right when he says painting was all finished centuries ago—but he is still young and one flings out such statements then. But he was certainly speaking truth when he said he continued to paint because he enjoyed doing it. How could anyone fail to enjoy painting as he does, evidently before his subject, with ample-sized paper and a fat, full-charged brush!

His mountain scenes, old houses by green-blue rivers, harbors with boats and spread sails, and village streets that flash with light reflections, are surcharged with that virile color and love of contrast that delight so many characteristically American painters. One thinks especially of Bellows before the best of these pictures. He deals in enjoyable and spirited compositions rather than in noticeably noble ones. One might crave a rest from such flashing brilliance at times and a more sensitively balanced structure. But if you were low in spirit how these would pick you up!

Elizabeth Spaulding is more gentle and more subtly rhythmical, though she cannot pretend to Whorf's technical mastery of the medium. Where Whorf is attracted by dramatic massing and contrasts of light and dark she is sensitive to the line of growth in her subjects, which are largely found among western deserts and mountains.

Some of her most charming works are "Three Aspens and a Waterfall," in which her brush finds the mounting and falling lines of trees, rocks and peaks in a mountain meadow. She is little concerned with shadows, sticking usually to clear light. But she is very poetic in her vision. See for instance how delightfully she saw the "Little Plum Tree" penned in by taller trees in a snowy courtyard.

As much of her work is dated it is interesting to follow her from the clumsier and more representational style of the earlier pictures through to the clearer, surer statement of linear music that now really interests her. This is an exhibition that collectors should see and that no student of water color should fail to study.

LATIN PORTRAITIST SHOWS IN PASADENA

Carlos de Corveda, the Latin-American artist who exhibits at the Grace Nicholson Galleries during the month of February, depicts a wide range in the choice of his subjects.

Of Spanish descent, Mr. de Corveda, through his years of study in Spain, adds to the sterling training he received in America the warmth of coloring and picturesque feeling of the Spanish. Gypsy musicians and dancers, peasants toiling in the fields, Grandees and beggars are depicted by this artist.

With the Spanish paintings will be seen a few of the portraits of prominent Southern Californians painted by Mr. De Corveda since his arrival here. Among these the recently completed portrait of John Steven McGroarty is certain to prove of interest to local art lovers.

"Hopi Policeman"

SYMONS IN RETROSPECT

For a few days during last week the Stendahl Galleries brought together a small group of paintings by the late George Gardner Symons N.A., pictures owned for the most part by Southern California art collectors, a showing that covered most phases of a painting activity that was singularly limited to the artist's favorite theme of New England hills and streams in snowy winter dress.

One critic rather aptly summed up the effect of Symons's life work on the impartial observer when he said that he "brought to conventional, almost trite, subjects a power, a clarity, a persuasion that each canvas was painted from the original impetus of a direct communication with nature."

With but two exceptions the pictures at the Stendahl Galleries dealt with the favorite winter stream, yet in each case the "communication with nature" struck the observer forcibly. He painted in clear tones and crisp brush strokes, and seemed particularly happy when painting large areas of water in cool grays shot here and there with reflections of pure color.

Symons prided himself upon his ability to paint outdoors in weather so cold that it drove most painters to cover and a warm fire. This accounts for the truth of his snow pictures, a vein in which his brush will acknowledge few peers. In general his mood was joyous. "Road through the Woods" reveals this in its lyrical curve and the lilting thin blue shadows of trees on white snow.

His solitary Laguna coast scene, surely painted at least fifteen years ago, is solidly massed though it does not disclose the purity of color of the winter canvases. His streams, now bearing slush of melting ice, now clear before the thaw, and the tints upon the hills, reveal the temperature and the time of day or year. It was not a broad field in which he worked, but one vigorously plowed.

Collectors who loaned the paintings to the exhibit were Messrs. and Mmes. Hugo Koeffer, Alvin Hofert, Edward McWilliams, Robert Linton, Robert Flick, Fred Flick, Fred Flint and Mrs. William M. Dawson.

MATISSE A CARNEGIE JUROR

Henri Matisse, probably the subtlest master of color living, has been appointed a juror for the next fall's Carnegie international exhibition of painting (the twenty-ninth). He is coming over here, says the Art Digest, and he is going to be interviewed, and he is going to be an event. It will be remembered that his "Still Life" was awarded first prize at the twenty-sixth Carnegie annual, which was the first official award Matisse had ever received.

Matisse was a pupil of Gerome (master of George de Forest Brush, who has remained a decided conventionalist) and spent much time in the Louvre copying Chardin and other old masters. His own work, when finally shown, won him the captaincy of "les fauves" (wild beasts.) Andre Derain, Maurice de Vlaminck, Othon Friesz and Raoul Dufy, all of whom have made individual names for themselves since those revolutionary days.

But Matisse is singularly free of successful imitators. When in Paris he opened a school, many years ago. He closed it after a year because he found his students imitating him instead of developing their own art. Long after critics and collectors had accepted the work of Derain and Friesz, Matisse remained matter for debate. The seeming slightness of his paint, the lack of somber seriousness in his compositions, and the flimsiness of the subject material on which he hung his colors and arabesques, caused them to hold back. Yet there is no living painter who has so strongly influenced younger modernists with the possible exception of Picasso, and no other who has moved color forward in a more logical direction from the start the impressionists gave it. The name of Matisse stands for delicious color surprises in the minds of those who enjoy his delicate art. There are still many, to be sure, who can see nothing in it.

PALETTE-CHISEL ELECTS

Leo Marzolo was re-elected president and James Topping re-elected treasurer of the Palette and Chisel Club at the annual election of officers held recently at the clubrooms, 1042 North Dearborn street, Chicago. Other new officers were chosen as follows:

First vice-president, Emory Seidel.

Second vice-president, Curtis B. Camp (fellowship member.)

REWARD FOR VAN DYCK

Lloyd's has offered an award of $40,000 for the recovery of Sir Anthony Van Dyck's "Concert des Anges," which was cut from its frame while in transit from its Belgian owner, M. Bechbache, to the Godfrey Phillips Galleries, London. The stolen picture, depicting the Madonna and Child surrounded by angels, has been estimated to be worth about $150,000.

HIGHEST PARIS PRICE

The highest price ever paid at auction for a work of art in Paris was given recently at a Paris auction house for an Italian primitive, guaranteed to be the work of Fra Filippo Lippi. A French dealer bid and paid down the sum of 2,171,000 francs (about $86,840) for the little masterpiece, says the New York Times.

LARGE PHILLIPS BEQUEST

A sum of $1,500,000 has been left the Phillips Memorial gallery in Washington, D. C., by the will of Mrs. Elisa Irwin Laughlin Phillips, mother of Duncan Phillips, reports the Washington Star. Mrs. Phillips died December 18, 1929.

WHAT IS A PICTUARY?

Famous Novelist Coins New Term and Expounds Plan to Put Art in Circulation

D. H. Lawrence, English novelist who has lately turned painter, wrote an article in December Vanity Fair that may well prove a turning point in the history of art enjoyment. He advocated the foundation of circulating "pictuaries" to function as libraries already are doing.

The idea is not entirely new. It is actually in operation in Pennsylvania, where the Art Alliance of Philadelphia rents pictures to institutions and individuals. But it has never been so clearly developed as in the Vanity Fair article, nor have the reasons for its urgency been so clearly stated before.

Pictures, like books, Lawrence points out, have most value and freshness when they are painted. They belong to that moment, are understood best by their contemporaries and, unless they are masterpieces, seldom give pleasure for more than a brief period. Why, he asks, should we not scrap dead pictures just as we scrap dead books? Why must movable pictures hang on the wall when, as far as their pleasure-giving function is concerned, they are just so many square feet of dead, painted canvas?

And then he answers himself, coming to the kernel of the present impasse that keeps most of us from enjoying or even contacting the works of art we should like.

ART NOT PROPERTY

Because, says Lawrence, "a picture is regarded as a piece of property and not as a source of esthetic emotion, of sheer pleasure, as a flower is." If our public has no judgment of contemporary art it is because it has little opportunity to become acquainted with the natural freshness of original works. What, he asks, is the sense of the artist having a studio full of paintings, prints, water colors, gathering dust, most of which will never be seen by anybody except as they are dragged out for his exhibitions, when the public can afford nothing for its walls but poor reproductions or photogravures?

One may answer that the public should be educated to spend its art just as it does for other pleasures. But the answer will not hold good for any but a limited few. People do not buy pictures to invest in them. Pictures are property in other words. Now when property goes stale on you it can be sold. So can a few pictures be sold for more than was paid for them, but the vast majority of pictures will fetch in the auction room only a fraction of their original price. Pictures, unless they are picked by the rare individual with a flare for esthetic value, do not increase in price, no matter what dealers may whisper in the heat of selling.

The value of a work of art cannot be measured in terms of property. What happened when books were made available to the general public from circulating libraries? The whole idea of a book as a rare possession vanished entirely and books are today measured mainly for their appeal to the mind or their permanent spiritual value. Will they stand up for a day? They are read and fulfill their function. For a year? They continue to be read. And the reading public has grown up since the birth of libraries that loaned and rented books.

PUT ART TO WORK

The novelist appeals to the department stores, who are making such strides in bringing contemporary art before the masses, to take up the idea of circulating "pictuaries," or suggests that an art co-operative society might well take up the idea. For, he reminds us, the artist is primarily interested in getting his work before the public where it can do its work. He is not out for high prices, keeping his work stacked in the studio, not because the whole scheme of merchandising pictures, or sculpture or any other form of purely expressive art on the property basis where it is only valued as it goes high.

And since art comes so high that the public be blamed for being unadventurous in its buying? If it buys it sticks to accepted values. Only a few can afford the risk of trusting their esthetic promptings. The property value also explains the deadness of the average collection of pictures. By the time a collector gets to see a private collection much of it has long been dead. Then he goes on and on and is ever more wished on some unfortunate museum to escape death taxes. Which explains why most museums are so dead.

Art, says the writer, is for the most part like flowers or pillow covers. One buys them to give pleasure

CRITICS PRAISE "CARD 13"

Distinguished Authors Approve Mystery Story by Mark Lee Luther and Lillian C. Ford

CARD 13. By Mark Lee Luther and Lillian C. Ford. Bobbs Merrill, Indianapolis.

Earl Derr Biggers, our most distinguished detective story writer, author of "The Black Camel," "Behind That Curtain," "The House without a Key," "Seven Keys to Baldpate," and other widely read mystery stories, says: In "Card 13" we find a critic with a keen, analytical mind and a novelist with a nice technique and a graceful style deliberating on a mystery novel. Lest I be accused of rolling my hollow log, I will restrain my enthusiasm for the result. But I will say that in my opinion Mrs. Ford and Mr. Luther have written an unusually good story of its kind. Let the chips fall where they may.

EARL DERR BIGGERS

PAUL JORDAN SMITH

The book opens with a stroke of genius. Having decided to set their scene in Hollywood, the authors looked around for someone to murder. They picked a scenario writer. This, as any author who has had his work mutilated by the screen will tell you, was an inspired choice. Magnificent! Why hasn't someone thought of it before? I don't mean a real life, of course—I mean for a book.

PLOT OUTLINED

We first see Anthony Gilmore, the scenario man, lunching at Musso's with his friend Ranelegh, the novelist, and his charming and innocent sister, Aileen. Gilmore himself is not so innocent; he has been going the Hollywood pace and the wages of sin are overdue. Three of his lady friends inspire his enjoyment of the cuisine—Dolly, who has had her face lifted but whose stock is still going down; Selma, the tigerish star who is on the crest of the wave, and Lola, the little extra he might better do does without. Dolly is giving one of those parties that evening, and she urges Gilmore to come and bring Aileen and the novelist.

Then Ranelegh calls at Gilmore's house to pick up his friend, a hint that Gilmore has forbidden his sister to take part in what promises to be a wild night, and he, who is movie-mad, is rather hurt. Gilmore's aunt and housekeeper, Mrs. Barnett, a good, Christian woman from Iowa who does not hold with sin, or gin, is to the point, for once in her life is seared with her wayward nephew. The girl remains at home and the two writers set out, after drinks in the "Virginian" put in the cool of the evening, when the wine, wimmin and song is merry afoot.

Dolly's party gets rough, but not rough enough to hold the gang, who move on to the next one, on the way to party number two, where stops at his house to get a manuscript. (The scene is being laid in California, this is one point that is never explained.) Gilmore in his car are Selma, quite drunk and disorderly, and her friend, a weak-kneed young millionaire. The scenario writer alights from the car in the drive, and is instantly shot down, the bullet coming apparently from behind a nearby hedge. The hedges in Hollywood are not exclusively for decoration.

POLICE ON SCENE

The Hollywood police are on the scene at once. If you remember Thornton Dumond Taylor, you know what that means. Also, a private investigator from the district attorney's office, named Kent. The latter is a sympathetic character as to fact, but it is Ranelegh, the novelist, who solves the crime in the end. Too bad—probably Kent is planning to run for Governor of California.

The story moves smoothly along, gaining impetus as it goes. A Hindu valet of Gilmore's—you know with what apprehension when he is around, but it's all right, he's human and there's no hocus-pocus—figures in the case, and there are startling developments concerned with a silver flask and a revolver, one of which Gilmore took with him to the party. It was with this that Selma was shot, and the fact was, oddly enough, lying on the floor at the moment when he came to the driveway.

The last part of the book is its best part, and the solution is to be found in the most brilliant thing in it. If you recall all the mystery stories that have started well and then petered up in the final pages, you know that this is a grand recommendation for "Card 13." It is the very best of all solutions—the one that is inherent in character.

Paul Jordan Smith, author of "Cables of Cobweb," "Nomad," "On Strange Altars" and other works, who also happens to be a discriminating detective story fan, says: A capital detective story this, and one that baffles even an experienced reader, holding fast to its grim secret to the very end, and affording him enough thrills along the way to keep him from a waiting bed until far into the night.

Curiously enough Hollywood's movie life, while providing a background for many sensational crimes, has been but little exploited by the writers of detective fiction. London, Chicago, Fifth avenue, the Maine woods and little islands off the coast of New England have been used repeatedly. And yet, aside from London, with its dark passageways and mystery-scented fogs, what better background for a first-rate detective thriller could one find than this same Hollywood, with its motley throngs of film queens and kings, with their newly acquired bank accounts, English accents, Spanish villas, Chinese cooks, Japanese valets, Russian wolfhounds, and early American bar-rooms? Romance and tragi-comedy are never far from the boulevard or the lots where the megaphone barks.

REAL HOLLYWOOD

Mr. Luther and Mrs. Ford have realized the possibilities to the full. They have given us the real Hollywood, peopled it with both the famous and the infamous film folk that we know, and, after making that necessary concession to reality, have created a yarn so convincing that at times one wonders whether this is not a clever solution of an actual crime-mystery.

The fan will find herein all the necessary constituents of a sound story. If he knows his Hollywood, he will be guided down familiar streets, into a well-known cafe, and will find himself quite at home. By the time the crime is committed all suspicion of unreality will have vanished, and he will believe himself an actual co-worker on the detective's staff, he will be caught up in a tangle of mystery that will keep him anxious and baffled until the very end of the book. The criminal is cleverly disguised, and there are no pointing arrows to guide you to his lair. And yet the reader is fairly given all the facts known to Kent, the professional investigator, and Ranleigh the clever amateur. There are no snide tricks played upon the reader: the clews are there in abundance, before his very eyes. If he is an experienced reader he will find his suspicions well distributed.

WHO KILLED DIRECTOR?

Who killed the great director? Was it Selma Saranoff, the passionate? Dolly Brownrigg, the former star? Ida Hunter, the voluptuous little extra? Gerald Hartley, Saranoff's wealthy lover? the slant-eyed Chinese valet? the subtle Hindu mystic, who lived conveniently next door? Or was it——? But the fan will resent suggestions. He will fall in love with the heroine, for there is a charming girl, who will play a part in upsetting the heart of at least one investigator—and he will identify himself with Ranelegh, the novelist who takes a hand in solving the mystery.

In a word, the man who has hitherto paid homage to Fletcher and Austin Freeman, will find this book to his liking; his emotions will be properly stirred, his intelligence uninsulted; for the conclusion is as logical as logic itself. And, when he lays the book down, he will be eager for the next Luther-Ford mystery.

The Detective Story Club showed rare good judgment when it selected this volume for the February book-of-the-month.

WINGS OF THE SUNSET. By Ina Coolbrith. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

All Californians who loved and honored Ina Coolbrith, who died last February at the age of 87, will welcome this volume of her poems, which contains her principal work since "Songs of the Golden Gate," issued in 1895. Her very first poems were published in Los Angeles when she was eleven. Later, while still very young, she was the adviser of Bret Harte, who accepted her judgment on all his work. She was friend to Stoddard, who thought her a genius. She discovered Jack London, when he came to the Oakland public library where she was librarian. Isadora Duncan was another of her "finds." Many others she encouraged to write and rejoiced in their success. And steadfastly she went her own way, expressing herself and life as she read it.

Charles Phillips in his memoir of her says: "There is in her poetry a sound, firm note, a note of permanence which is truly Victorian, and which sets off her songs from the evanescent as music is set off from clamor and noise. This, as I see, read, and hear Ina Coolbrith's poetry, is its special characteristic."

A Group of Recent Books

THE QUINTESSENCE OF NATHANISM. By Vladimar Kozlenko. Vrest Orton, New York.

"With Nathan as the pivot upon which solid, constructive criticism of the real American theater and its drama developed, we encounter what we may honestly call the first authentic critical interpretation of the American stage," says Vladimar Kozlenko in this small volume, of which only 300 copies have been printed.

We are told that "the bitter and afflictive puritanism, the Sunday-school pruderies, sentimental propaganda rubbish, moralizing homiletics" that passed for plays when Nathan started in to clear all such stuff away were disheartening. "A play by Ibsen or Shaw or Strindberg or Gorky was," according to the standards of the time, "a sewer of vulgarity. Veracious portrayals of life were denounced as sexual and disgusting abominations. The candidness and penetration of such writers' attitudes were condemned as pornographic and of the devil." How Nathan, constructive critic, has changed all this is set forth in this volume, which is one that all Nathan fans will welcome. That it might be argued that other critics and other factors than criticism have helped to work the changes indicated does not detract too greatly from the honor due the leading critic of the period.

A HUNGRY YOUNG LADY. By Marian Spitzer. Horace Liveright, New York.

Juliet Hays, wife of a prosperous stock broker, was convinced that she could win a career on the stage. For didn't she always win all the honors in the Hospital Show? By a stroke of good luck she met a producer, got a card to a director, was put in the chorus of a promising show. She had looks and a good voice, but she couldn't act. So she felt it necessary to win her way by flattering the men who controlled the stage. First she tried it on Tony, well-known critic. Tony fell for her, but expected her to follow the usual procedure. This was something Juliet thought she couldn't do. But she found she could.

Here's where bad luck entered. Tony told her she was sweet, but he failed to promote her interests. She was avid for bigger parts, for more publicity, for more love; she wanted to be taken to the Colony and the Algonquin and the Ritz and have people point her out as the successful Juliet Dexter. And she found that plotting and scheming weren't enough: she had to have talent; had even to have character and the strength to stand the gaff. So our hungry young lady was glad in the end that she had an adoring husband and admiring friends who thought her a great actress.

Miss Spitzer tells her story with a nice satire that shows what she thinks of pampered climbers; she knows New York theatrical life; and she succeeds in making her story one that cuts down below the surface of the entertaining incidents she competently presents.

BLOOD ROYAL. By Dornford Yates. Minton, Balch & Co., New York.

When Richard Chandos and George Hanbury went in their Rolls-Royce with their two servants to Austria on a fishing trip they had no idea of the really amazing series of adventures that were to be theirs, nor of the stunning princess who was to win the heart and forever haunt the soul of Richard.

A storm started things. In its midst their machine was stopped on a lonely road and a man thrust into the tonneau. He proved to be Duke Paul, heir to a small kingdom somewhere in the Tyrol. His uncle is reported dying, a cousin of Paul's is trying to get the throne; Paul has been duped and made prisoner; by a mistake he is thrust into the wrong automobile.

He is taken to the home of the spirited Grand Duchess, to whom he has long been betrothed, and reveals himself as a coward, a weakling and a libertine. But the Grand Duchess, though she will not let him touch her, fights manfully for his succession. And the two English travelers, with their valiant men servants, fight with her. Why does she want to put Paul on the throne? Is it because of her own ambition? Only after the most entertaining series of adventures that have happened in a book since "Graustark" do we find out, and draw our breath in relief.

This is no cheap romance; it is, instead, a remarkably well-written and dramatic tale that succeeds in doing the thing the author set out to do; to tell an entertaining story.

ATTRACTIVE OFFERS MADE AUTHOR OF "MISSISSIPPI"

Ben Lucien Burman is a very happy man these days. His first novel, "Mississippi," published by Farrar & Rinehart, has not only aroused enthusiasm, but has brought him a number of attractive offers from magazine editors seeking to secure his future work. The volume has also been obtained for British publication by the first English publisher who saw it and a request has just been received from Europe for the French and German translation rights.

Mr. Burman declares that the present situation is in sharp contrast with that some years ago when he first began writing. The editor of one of the leading magazines telephoned him to come to see him at once as the magazine was buying one of his stories, and the writer was so penniless that the only way he could get the necessary subway fare to reach the office was to borrow three 2-cent stamps from an equally poverty-stricken friend and sell them in a neighboring candy store for a nickel.

Ben Lucien Burman

After graduation from Harvard College, Mr. Burman served as a reporter on the Boston Herald, as assistant city editor of the Cincinnati Times Star, then as special writer for the New York World, besides frequently contributing to the Century, the Nation and the other leading literary publications.

Abandoning newspaper work in 1924, he returned to his home in the South to devote himself to writing fiction. For some years before, through his fondness for the river and his friendship with old steamboat captains, he had had the idea of reviving in literature the old river life made famous by Mark Twain. Now he began to develop the idea in earnest, seizing every opportunity to travel on a river packet or talk with a grizzled shantyman New Orleans or Memphis bound.

When a boat was forbidden to carry passengers, he shipped as crew; expert pilots taught him how to steer so that other rivermen might find no fault with what he wrote. Whenever anything unusual occurs on the river, if it is possible, he is there. He was on the Betsy Ann during her race with the Tom Greene this summer—incidentally he insists it was the Betsy, not the Tom, which won the race; when the great flood of 1927 swept down the valley, he was at the scene, going from flooded town to flooded town, traveling on a packet delivering relief supplies to the refugees.

The writer's married life is particularly interesting, his wife being Alice Caddy, formerly of Ottawa, Canada, an illustrator whose work is well known to many of the readers of the women's magazines. The two describe themselves as incurable tramps, and they roam the world together, Mr. Burman taking notes, and his wife making sketches, one week steamboating through the Louisiana swamps, the next tramping through southern mountains where the writer has many friends and of whose rugged inhabitants he is an intense admirer.

The Burmans do not always confine their wanderings to America, however, having spent a large part of last year on the coasts of Bou-Saa-Daa in the Sahara Desert, where Mr. Burman wrote "Mississippi." Seemingly this is a very curious place to write about the great river, but not according to the author, who is strong in the belief that a better perspective can be obtained by distance.

"It's the old proverb of not being able to see the forest for the trees," said Mr. Burman the other day. "If I decide to write a story of our life among the Arabs in the desert, I won't go to Algiers or the Toureg country to do it. I'll be much more apt to get a shanty-boat and write it floating down the Mississippi."

THE BROKEN BALANCE

Mourning the broken balance, the hopeless prostration of the earth
Under men's hands and their minds,
The beautiful places kil'ed like rabbits to make a city,
The spreading fungus, the slime-threads
And spores, my own coast's obscene future: I remember the farther
Future, and the last man dying
Without succession under the confident eyes of the stars.
It was only a moment's accident,
The race that plagued us; the world resumes the old lonely immortal Splendor; from here I can even
Perceive that that snuffed candle had something . . . a fantastic virtue,
A faint and unshapely pathos. . . .
So death will flatter them at last; what, even the bald ape's by-shot
Was moderately admirable?

—[From "Dear Judas and Other Poems," by Robinson Jeffers. (Horace Liveright.)

Gossip of the Book World

J. J. Connington has gained an established reputation as a writer of deductive fiction, with seven novels bearing his name. He has concealed his identity behind a pseudonym, but he is, in fact, a widely known scientist. His new book is "The Eye in the Museum."

Capt. B. H. Liddell Hart in his new book "The Decisive Wars of History: A Study in Strategy," reviews the most important wars in history. Starting with the Greek wars, the Athenian disaster at Syracuse which wrung from Thucydides that tight-lipped and desolate summary, "and of the many who went out, few returned home again," he traces the strategic course of the great wars of history down through the last Allied offensive of 1918, the last "hundred days" which, he says, "confirm the immemorial lesson that the true aim of war is the mind of the hostile rulers, not the

FOREIGN POLICY VIEW AIRED

Nicholas Roosevelt in New Volume Sees Obstacles to Anglo-American Co-operation

AMERICA AND ENGLAND? By Nicholas Roosevelt. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith, New York.

"It would be foolish to pretend that America's lack of knowledge and understanding of world affairs, coupled with the handicap which the American system of government places on the carrying out of any consistent foreign policy, does not present a serious obstacle in the way of effective Anglo-American co-operation." This is the conclusion of Nicholas Roosevelt in his just published volume, "America and England?"

But co-operation is possible, if only the American as well as the English people will become informed of some of the stumbling blocks in their way, watch their step, and move intelligently.

Naval parity; that hoary old trouble-maker; the freedom of the seas; the question of merchant shipping in time of war; the whole problem of defense without aggression—these are the foci of misunderstanding. The list is not new, but Mr. Roosevelt's fair-minded approach to them and his tolerant discussion are enlightening. Thus his book becomes one that intelligent Americans should read at this time, with the new effort on the part of President Hoover and Premier MacDonald to bring about an understanding between the nations.

MISCONCEPTIONS RIFE

Misconceptions are rife. It is said that England's day is done; that our expansion, commercial and financial, was due to war profiteering and is merely a flash in the pan; that England will go to war before she will submit to naval equality with us; that we are deliberately seeking to dominate the world; that our trade is a menace to that of other countries; that England provokes anti-American sentiment in Latin America; that New York is displacing London as the financial center of the world; that we are not being successful foreign financiers and are bound to lose what we have gained. You will notice that these charges are arranged as a tit-for-tat. There is a modicum of truth in each statement, along with a maximum of danger to the understanding between the two great English-speaking nations.

In order to clear the way for just conclusions Mr. Roosevelt starts out with an appraisal of the relative strength of England and the United States in natural resources, production, foreign trade, international finance and shipping. At first glance the advantage seems to be with us in every one of these. But there are offsets that tend to keep our heads from overexpansion. Here are some of them: England's long experience in finance and foreign trade and foreign investments, with proven foreign connections and a firmly established reputation for business integrity (no wooden nutmegs in her past,) her supply of skilled labor with long training in special industries; her solid bulk of foreign investments, which in spite of the wholesale liquidation during the war now overtop ours by $8,000,000,000, her vastly superior merchant marine.

COMPLICATIONS LISTED

At the last Mr. Roosevelt tells us: "It is essential that Americans realize not only the European com-

UNRIVALED VALUE-GIVING EVENTS!

La Reina de Los Angeles. In 1880, little more than a Pueblo...colorful...sunny... contented...awaiting its destiny. In 1930...a world city of homes...of commerce...vivid... vigorous...dominant...with destiny fulfilled

FOR FIFTY YEARS, Barker Bros. have been a part of the life of Los Angeles. In 1880...a small store near the Pico House on Main Street. Now, in 1930, one of the world's outstanding institutions devoted exclusively to furnishings for homes of every type. The growth of Los Angeles to its present position as a world city has been reflected in the progress of Barker Bros.

Barker Bros. appreciate the confidence that has been a most cherished possession through 50 years of service to the people of Southern California. Without a practical demonstration of that confidence, Barker Bros. would never have grown to its present dominant position. Constant maintenance of a policy that strives to give the utmost of value, without compromise of quality, has been the basis of that faith through half a century.

1930 is Golden Jubilee Year at Barker Bros....a year of celebration. It might be called "Appreciation Year", too. Every day in February, and throughout the year, Barker Bros. celebrate the 50th year through value-giving events...scaled in importance to the numberless hosts of friends whose great good will has given a half century of success.

Few home furnishing organizations in the world are so ideally equipped to offer superlative values. The tremendous buying power that Barker Bros.' great volume of business makes possible, means lower prices and better quality for the dollar. Resources, developed through 50 years of contact in the world's markets, are co-operating to make Golden Jubilee Year at Barker Bros. one to be long remembered.

For February, the first month of the Jubilee Year, a series of value-giving events has been developed. Watch for these events, plan to take advantage of them and share in the savings which will be extraordinary in every case. Tomorrow, the first day, Barker Bros. offer an entire store filled with unusual savings in every department. Come tomorrow and let Barker Bros. express appreciation to friends old and new through the tangible, practical medium of money-saving opportunities to make more homes better homes.

An interesting study of Jean Swartz, as she appeared in Palm Beach on her recent trip to the East, where she selected marvelous materials for her spring showing in her fashion salons on Hollywood Boulevard, near Gower, and on Wilshire Boulevard in Beverly Hills. The ensemble worn here by Jean Swartz is fashioned of rose-colored imported Rodier material, combined with fur. Rose-colored hand-made lace trimming on dress.

Beckman's Exclusive Fur Shop of West Seventh Street introduces for the approval of the discriminating women of Southern California this elegant wrap of white Russian ermine, trimmed luxuriously with white fox, worn here in a queenly manner by Belle Bennett.

Virginia Bruce selected at Beckman's Exclusive Fur Shop these exquisite natural cross fox skins, which make an extremely flattering fur piece for early spring, and may be worn with costumes for all times of the day—street, afternoon or sports. Beckman has recently imported many striking new fur combinations in small fur pieces and stunning light weight fur wraps for early spring and summer wear.

Honey Bun Hereley wearing a brown and white Harris tweed coat. This pattern originally was made exclusively for the Prince of Wales. The coat has an inverted plait in the back. White beret and washable English chamois gloves complete the ensemble. This and many other exclusive and extremely smart sports outfits may be seen at the Hereley and Company Sports Shop on South Oxford, near Wilshire.

One of the crowning glories of the modern woman is shown here by beautiful Kathryn McGuire—William Hepner's "Halo-Tress." Practically every woman who endeavors to appear well groomed, possesses one of these wonderful hair creations, fashioned of naturally curly hair, and of every shade to blend with one's own hair. The "Halo-Tress" may be found at Hepner's Beauty Salons, 1001 West Seventh Street and 6540 Sunset Blvd.

A charming study of Doraldina, one of the foremost authorities on the art of perfect make-up and care of the skin. Doraldina has recently returned from a successful lecture tour throughout the states. On February 3, 4 and 6, at two o'clock each afternoon, Doraldina will lecture and personally demonstrate the art of perfect make-up at Bullock's Auditorium.

Norma Talmadge wearing a flattering and graceful ensemble of flesh chiffon, which she wore in "New York Nights." The cape is a charming example of the lines and length which will be worn this summer, for no chiffon gown will be complete this coming season without its own wrap.

Taste its wonderful flavor!

Then remember the reasons:

Pure ingredients,

Careful methods of making,

High-grade Jamaica ginger

THE COOLING, refreshing, delightful qualities of "Canada Dry" have won the praise of connoisseurs the wide world over. The unforgettable flavor of this fine old ginger ale makes it the favorite beverage in countless homes.

The answer to its popularity lies in basic excellence. The very foundation of "Canada Dry" is "Liquid Ginger"—which we make from selected Jamaica ginger root by a special process. This process is exclusively controlled by us and, unlike any other method, retains for "Canada Dry" all of the original aroma, flavor and natural essence of the ginger root. Rigid laboratory control assures uniformity, purity and highest quality. A special process of carbonation enables "Canada Dry" to retain its sparkle long after the bottle has been opened.

No wonder you will want to order it in the Hostess Package of 12 bottles!

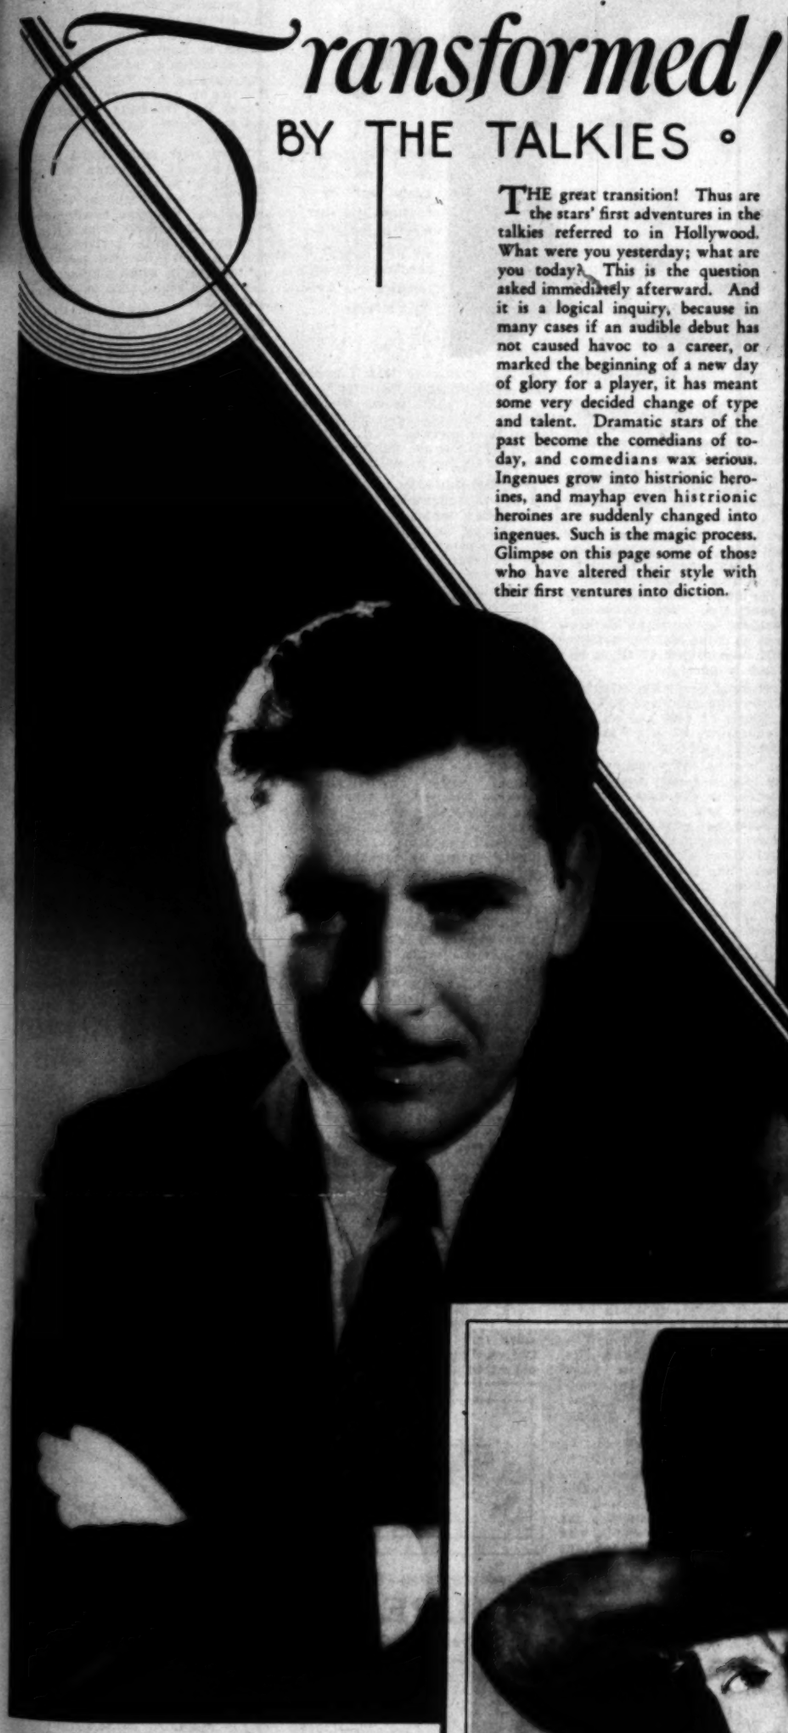
Transformed BY THE TALKIES

THE great transition! Thus are the stars' first adventures in the talkies referred to in Hollywood. What were you yesterday; what are you today? This is the question asked immediately afterward. And it is a logical inquiry, because in many cases if an audible debut has not caused havoc to a career, or marked the beginning of a new day of glory for a player, it has meant some very decided change of type and talent. Dramatic stars of the past become the comedians of today, and comedians wax serious. Ingenues grow into histrionic heroines, and mayhap even histrionic heroines are suddenly changed into ingenues. Such is the magic process. Glimpse on this page some of those who have altered their style with their first ventures into diction.



Most distinctly a clever light comedian is Ronald Colman—with voice. "Bulldog Drummond" showed this. Even in "Condemned" he could not appear altogether serious.—Photo by Alexander.

He was once the suave and polished drawing-room man, but since "In Old Arizona" and "Romance of the Rio Grande," Warner Baxter has become a Spanish-accented westerner.—Photo by Autrey.

Fay Wray . . . sweet and perhaps even a bit simple of yore . . . is now blossoming as one of the more ardent sophisticates in "Thunderbolt" and "Pointed Heels."—Photo by Dyar.

Always a gay comedienne, Laura La Plante, in "Show Boat" (part talking) and "La Marseillaise," waxes undeniably serious and even emotional.

Has the "little girl" grown up, at last? One has reason to believe so upon seeing Mary Pickford in "Coquette" and "The Taming of the Shrew."

Is Corinne Griffith becoming a jazzy personality? The lovely orchid is unquestionably different in "Lilies of the Field," which departs decidedly even from the previous version she appeared in.

THE OLD YEAR IS DEAD; LONG LIVE THE NEW YEAR

Fritzi Ridgeway's New Year's Eve party took on a cosmopolitan air, when many of her guests began to converse in foreign tongues.—Photo by Cannons.

In which Stella and her famous playmates welcome in 1930

By GRACE KINGSLEY

"WE'RE to ring the old year out and the new year in with Fritzi Ridgeway, Victor McLaglen, Jack Oakie, Gwen Lee, Simeon Gest, and a lot of other fascinating people," remarked Stella, enthusiastically waving an invitation. "And there's to be a real Arab sheik there, too!"

"Well, when you can arrange anything as nice as that," I retorted, "I don't in the least mind your disposing of my hours."

THE party was held at the picturesque home of Fritzi Ridgeway and her musician husband, Constantine Bakilienikoff, and when we arrived we found any number of people ahead of us, including Simeon Gest and his bride, Maria Bekeff, the dancer, whom he had wed down in Mexico a few months ago; Victor McLaglen, Mr. and Mrs. Gunther Lessing, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Lippe, Karl Brown, Gwen Lee, Jack Oakie, Elise Bartlett, Joseph Schildkraut, Florence Forman, Doris Lloyd, Mr. and Mrs. Franklin Hanson and dozens of others, who overflowed the drawing-room and spilled into the big rathskeller in the basement.

And then there was the Arab sheik—you pronounce it like "shake," you know—Sheik Scandrian, from Bagdad, handsome and dashing. He is an Oxford graduate, and maybe if we hadn't known he was an Arab we shouldn't have decided that there was something fascinatingly primitive about him. But we did decide that he looked just as a sheik should, and as though he might grab you up behind him on his prancing Arabian steed and carry you off to his desert tent any minute.

And Stella, after gazing into his dark eyes, said that as for her, if he did steal her, she'd certainly stay! In fact, she might hang around a bit, just waiting to be stolen.

WE WONDERED if he had any of his picturesque clothing on the trip with him—he was wearing formal evening clothes, you see—but he said, with naive regret, that he hadn't brought any of his sartorial desert scenery along with him.

"But I can just imagine," remarked Stella, when he had left us to hie him down to the rathskeller in the basement, leaving us for the moment alone before the living-room fire, "how he would look dressed up in those clothes that look as if the Monday clothesline had been raided. I think he must look wonderful."

He returned presently, bringing Stella refreshments, and told us that, though he had had an English education, he had "known life since he was ten."

That sounded very intriguing, and he told us calmly that when he was ten, he was considered by his tribe to be a man, as he was really nearly full grown, and when he had expressed a wish for a wife, his mother had promptly brought him one. She had died, though, and he hadn't married again. He didn't think he would, now, until he was around thirty-five. He is only twenty-five now.

He owns a great estate, of "fifteen or twenty thousand acres," a few miles from Bagdad.

But, of course, he is a little bit interested in pictures!

However, I think his interest is very superficial, and only if he wins a very good part or is employed in an advisory capacity, will he consent to work.

WE ASKED him which nationality of women most intrigued him, but he was too wary to answer that—said they were all charming. But he admitted that the English women were beautiful with their fresh skins; that the French women "had a way" with them; that the American girls were piquant; but we rather gathered the idea that when he gets ready to marry, he will wed an Arab girl.

He told us about being lost on the desert for many hours in a sandstorm when he was hunting, one time; but when we found he had gone out in an automobile, we lost interest somewhat. However, that interest revived when, having asked him how he fared, and whether they did not get thirsty, he said:

"When the sun came up, we faced toward it, and then went in the direction of our right hands. An Arab will always find water that way."

We heard how the cowboys out in Arizona, when the Sheik was down there lately, had kidded him and tried to furnish him a bucking horse he couldn't ride, but how he had fooled them all.

A PERFECTLY wonderful colored orchestra was playing for the dancing, down in the rathskeller, which is outfitted with a big fireplace, in which a great fire was burning, with steins hung on the wall, and with comfortable sofas and chairs. The furniture, however, had mostly been moved back for the dancing, and the floor was crowded when we reached there.

Fritzi Ridgeway wore a short evening dress. She said that she had to skip about so much, upstairs and down, attending to her guests, that she couldn't be bothered with long skirts.

Elise Bartlett and Joseph Schildkraut had to leave before midnight, as Rudolph Schildkraut and his wife expected the young folks to join with them in watching the old year out and the new year in. But Elise didn't seem very hilarious about leaving Fritzi's nice party.

Elise had spent a lingual evening, speaking German with Charles Klein and Klein's pretty ex-wife, Russian with Simeon Gest, and French with the Sheik. And after she had gone, we heard her linguistic abilities discussed, and found that she speaks all these languages perfectly. Clever Elise!

MR. BAKILIENIKOFF was conducting the orchestra for the opening of "Oh, Susanna," at the Mayan, and so was late in arriving, but greeted everybody with charming Russian hospitality when he did come, even though he must have been terribly tired from much rehearsing and long hours at the theatre, including an all-night rehearsal the night before.

Florence Forman proved a most interesting and intelligent, as well as pretty, girl. She has lately returned from a long dancing engagement in Europe, where she danced in Paris, London and Berlin.

One felt proud of this American girl, who, unaffected, intelligent, charming, with no actress mannerisms about her at all, had not only made a big success in Europe, but had eagerly drunk in all the information she could get about history, over there, spending all her spare hours sightseeing and reading. It is quite likely that she will go into talking pictures.

She said that nearly all the French chateaus were deserted, since their owners, even of those occupied before the war, were now too poor to live in them.

THERE was a lot of New Year gag paraphernalia down in the rathskeller, which Sammy Blum was going to exploit—only, he wailed, nobody would stop to listen or watch.

However, Simeon Gest helped out by donning a fierce red mustache and wild-looking protruding false teeth over his own, and Sammy Cohn read his place card to us, written by Sammy Blum, which read, "The man that invented near beer was a darn poor judge of distance." Sammy also did some funny falls.

We followed Mr. Blum over to what he called his exhibit, and there on a shelf he had collected, and labelled as the Zoo, a lot of animal crackers, while cans of sardines formed the aquarium. And Sammy went around, offering to brush everybody's clothes, meeting with resentful surprise, but finally ending by brushing them off with a musical brush!

THERE was a lot of good entertainment by the numerous artists who were guests, including piano playing by Mr. Wolff, songs by Marion Harris, Nita Martan, Mrs. Hilda Goldman and others.

Ben White, who helps his brother, Jack White, make comedies, was there, and told us how he used to go to school with Laura LaPlante, and what a good little student she was; how she wore her hair in two braids down her back, and how he used to draw pictures of her. He was awfully in love with her, he said, and used to have fist fights with his classmates over her, but he never did really find out whether she cared for him or not. Now isn't that like Laura the Inscrutable?

He went to school with Bebe Daniels, too, and he and Bebe used to ride bicycles. They were riding one day near Harold Lloyd's studio. Harold was working out in the street, caught sight of Bebe, and as she stood watching him work, he left the scene and came over to ask her if she'd like to work in pictures. She was only twelve, then, but soon became Harold's leading lady.

Norman Kerry came late, bringing Marion Harris; and Mr. and Mrs. Montagu Glass were among the guests.

DORIS LLOYD was there, looking thin and beautiful. She told us about Ruby Miller, who, you remember, came to Hollywood and created something of a sensation, five or six years ago, by her claims to London fame and her wild spending of money, while she was working for FBO. She said that Ruby had married a man named Max Drewisky, in London, and had become quite a great society lady.

There were many noted musicians present, including, besides the above, Sylvio Savant, of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra; Margit Hegedus, noted violinist, and her husband, Donald Kahn.

Victor McLaglen arrived in his golf clothes, as he had had to go to the studio after playing golf, and hadn't found time to go home and change.

WHEN the New Year hour struck, we celebrated with a ringing of bells and singing of songs, but I really doubt, as I told Stella afterward, whether we could have made much more noise than we were already making before that.

Buffet supper was served at one o'clock, there was more entertainment, more dancing, and altogether we decided that if that party was any criterion of the parties we were to attend during the year, we were going to have a very good time indeed.

KATHLEEN MARY QUINLAN
Stylist in Beauty
Forecasts naturalness for the Beauty Mode

THE LILY will not be gilded this season! Beauty—in all of its natural charm—is in vogue. When Paris whispered that Madam and Miss would be fascinatingly feminine, Kathleen Mary Quinlan, with her subtle art, was the first to make it possible.

And because little make-up is to be used—powder and rouge in natural tones—Miss Quinlan foresaw that complexions must be smooth and fine, as lovely and delicate as the waxen petals of the camellia; eyes like stars, youthful and sparkling; hair—lustrous with health.

So Miss Quinlan recommends thorough daily care of the skin to include cleansing with her delightful Cleansing Oil; stimulating with Skin Stimulant; moulding in one of her three exquisite tissue creams (one for every type of skin) and finally, closing and firming the tiny pores with Violet or Double Strength Astringent.

AND MAKE-UP? Miss Quinlan has created powder bases, powder, rouge, and lipsticks—natural in coloring—which are, as Paris says, "extremely chic."

Miss Quinlan's preparations can be purchased in the leading stores of Los Angeles, Hollywood, Long Beach, Pasadena, Santa Monica, Riverside, San Diego, Beverly Hills.

HIGH SEAS MELODRAMA IN PSYCHOLOGICAL TWIST

By EDWIN SCHALLERT

A WEIRD melodrama of the high seas, in which a steward goes haywire, and threatens the lives of a group of high society passengers, and eventually has the tables turned on him by one of the girls of the party in a purely psychological manner—that's "The Ship From Shanghai."

This production directed by Charles Brabin is unusual enough in setting and ideas at this stage of talkie-making to command considerable interest. Kay Johnson, Conrad Nagel, Louis Wolheim, Carmel Myers and others are principals, but it is Wolheim's glad day. He portrays the steward, the dominant character in the plot.

Miss Johnson is immensely effective in her dramatic scenes, and has several bigger moments, especially in the situation where she convinces the steward of his utter and preposterous madness in attempting to become aught but an "under dog."

"The Ship From Shanghai" was adapted from the novel, "Ordeal," by Dale Collins, and the uniqueness of its appeal is intensified by the excellent storm effects, which leave the yacht a virtual wreck. The adventurous character of its story is interesting.

In addition to the players already mentioned, very efficacious performances are given by Zeffie Tilbury, Holmes Herbert and Ivan Linow

Have you noted how few people are now over-fat, as compared with years ago? Slender figures are the vogue. And they have brought to millions new youth and beauty, new health and vigor.

Look about you in any crowd, and you will realize that some new factor has been found. People are not starving to reduce. They are combating the cause of obesity, which usually lies in an under-active gland. Modern science has discovered the remedy, and physicians the world over now employ it.

A famous medical laboratory embodies the method in Marmola prescription tablets. People have used them for 22 years—millions of boxes of them. They have told the results to others. So countless people now reduce in this right and easy way.

The Marmola prescription is not secret. A book in each box states the formula, and explains the results. Your own doctor would probably prescribe the same help if you asked him.

No abnormal exercise or diet. Simply take four tablets of Marmola daily until your loss of fat proves that the cause is corrected.

Try Marmola, if you need it. Do this in fairness to yourself, your family and friends. Correct this wrong condition and note the amazing results. Life will bring you many new joys when you cease to overweigh. Start today.

THE OLD YEAR IS DEAD; LONG LIVE THE NEW YEAR

In which Stella and her famous playmates welcome in 1930

Fritzi Ridgeway's New Year's Eve party took on a cosmopolitan air, when many of her guests began to converse in foreign tongues.—Photo by Cannons.

By GRACE KINGSLEY

"WE'RE to ring the old year out and the new year in with Fritzi Ridgeway, Victor McLaglen, Jack Oakie, Gwen Lee, Simeon Gest, and a lot of other fascinating people," remarked Stella, enthusiastically waving an invitation. "And there's to be a real Arab sheik there, too!"

"Well, when you can arrange anything as nice as that," I retorted, "I don't in the least mind your disposing of my hours."

THE party was held at the picturesque home of Fritzi Ridgeway and her musician husband, Constantine Bakilienikoff, and when we arrived we found any number of people ahead of us, including Simeon Gest and his bride, Maria Bekeli, the dancer, whom he had wed down in Mexico a few months ago; Victor McLaglen, Mr. and Mrs. Gunther Lessing, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Lippe, Karl Brown, Gwen Lee, Jack Oakie, Elise Bartlett, Joseph Schildkraut, Florence Forman, Doris Lloyd, Mr. and Mrs. Franklin Hanson and dozens of others, who overflowed the drawing-room and spilled into the big rathskeller in the basement.

And then there was the Arab sheik—you pronounce it like "shake," you know—Sheik Scandrian, from Bagdad, handsome and dashing. He is an Oxford graduate, and maybe if we hadn't known he was an Arab we shouldn't have decided that there was something fascinatingly primitive about him. But we did decide that he looked just as a sheik should, and as though he might grab you up behind him on his prancing Arabian steed and carry you off to his desert tent any minute.

And Stella, after gazing into his dark eyes, said that as for her, if he did steal her, she'd certainly stay! In fact, she might hang around a bit, just waiting to be stolen.

WE WONDERED if he had any of his picturesque clothing on the trip with him—he was wearing formal evening clothes, you see—but he said, with naive regret, that he hadn't brought any of his sartorial desert scenery along with him.

"But I can just imagine," remarked Stella, when he had left us to hie him down to the rathskeller in the basement, leaving us for the moment alone before the living-room fire, "how he would look dressed up in those clothes that look as if the Monday clothesline had been raided. I think he must look wonderful."

He returned presently, bringing Stella refreshments, and told us that, though he had had an English education, he had "known life since he was ten."

That sounded very intriguing, and he told us calmly that when he was ten, he was considered by his tribe to be a man, as he was really nearly full grown, and when he had expressed a wish for a wife, his mother had promptly brought him one. She had died, though, and he hadn't married again. He didn't think he would, now, until he was around thirty-five. He is only twenty-five now.

He owns a great estate, of "fifteen or twenty thousand acres," a few miles from Bagdad.

But, of course, he is a little bit interested in pictures!

However, I think his interest is very superficial, and only if he wins a very good part or is employed in an advisory capacity, will he consent to work.

WE ASKED him which nationality of women most intrigued him, but he was too wary to answer that—said they were all charming. But he admitted that the English women were beautiful with their fresh skins; that the French women "had a way" with them; that the American girls were piquant; but we rather gathered the idea that when he gets ready to marry, he will wed an Arab girl.

He told us about being lost on the desert for many hours in a sandstorm when he was hunting, one time; but when we found he had gone out in an automobile, we lost interest somewhat. However, that interest revived when, having asked him how he fared, and whether they did not get thirsty, he said:

"When the sun came up, we faced toward it, and then went in the direction of our right hands. An Arab will always find water that way."

We heard how the cowboys out in Arizona, when the Sheik was down there lately, had kidded him and tried to furnish him a bucking horse he couldn't ride, but how he had fooled them all.

A PERFECTLY wonderful colored orchestra was playing for the dancing, down in the rathskeller, which is outfitted with a big fireplace, in which a great fire was burning, with steins hung on the wall, and with comfortable sofas and chairs. The furniture, however, had mostly been moved back for the dancing, and the floor was crowded when we reached there.

Fritzi Ridgeway wore a short evening dress. She said that she had to skip about so much, upstairs and down, attending to her guests, that she couldn't be bothered with long skirts.

Elise Bartlett and Joseph Schildkraut had to leave before midnight, as Rudolph Schildkraut and his wife expected the young folks to join with them in watching the old year out and the new year in. But Elise didn't seem very hilarious about leaving Fritzi's nice party.

Elise had spent a lingual evening, speaking German with Charles Klein and Klein's pretty ex-wife, Russian with Simeon Gest, and French with the Sheik. And after she had gone, we heard her linguistic abilities discussed, and found that she speaks all these languages perfectly. Clever Elise!

MR. BAKILIENIKOFF was conducting the orchestra for the opening of "Oh, Susanna," at the Mayan, and so was late in arriving, but greeted everybody with charming Russian hospitality when he did come, even though he must have been terribly tired from much rehearsing and long hours at the theatre, including an all-night rehearsal the night before.

Florence Forman proved a most interesting and intelligent, as well as pretty, girl. She has lately returned from a long dancing engagement in Europe, where she danced in Paris, London and Berlin.

One felt proud of this American girl, who, unaffected, intelligent, charming, with no actress mannerisms about her at all, had not only made a big success in Europe, but had eagerly drunk in all the information she could get about history, over there, spending all her spare hours sightseeing and reading. It is quite likely that she will go into talking pictures.

She said that nearly all the French chateaus were deserted, since their owners, even of those occupied before the war, were now too poor to live in them.

THERE was a lot of New Year gag paraphernalia down in the rathskeller, which Sammy Blum was going to exploit—only, he wailed, nobody would stop to listen or watch.

However, Simeon Gest helped out by donning a fierce red mustache and wild-looking protruding false teeth over his own, and Sammy Cohn read his place card to us, written by Sammy Blum, which read, "The man that invented near beer was a darn poor judge of distance." Sammy also did some funny falls.

We followed Mr. Blum over to what he called his exhibit, and there on a shelf he had collected, and labelled as the Zoo, a lot of animal crackers, while cans of sardines formed the aquarium. And Sammy went around, offering to brush everybody's clothes, meeting with resentful surprise, but finally ending by brushing them off with a musical brush!

THERE was a lot of good entertainment by the numerous artists who were guests, including piano playing by Mr. Wolff, songs by Marion Harris, Nita Martan, Mrs. Hilda Goldman and others.

Ben White, who helps his brother, Jack White, make comedies, was there, and told us how he used to go to school with Laura LaPlante, and what a good little student she was; how she wore her hair in two braids down her back, and how he used to draw pictures of her. He was awfully in love with her, he said, and used to have fist fights with his classmates over her, but he never did really find out whether she cared for him or not. Now isn't that like Laura the Inscrutable?

He went to school with Bebe Daniels, too, and he and Bebe used to ride bicycles. They were riding one day near Harold Lloyd's studio. Harold was working out in the street, caught sight of Bebe, and as she stood watching him work, he left the scene and came over to ask her if she'd like to work in pictures. HIGH SEAS MELODRAMA UNIQUE IN PSYCHOLOGICAL TWIST

A WEIRD melodrama of the high seas, in which a steward goes haywire, and threatens the lives of a group of high society passengers, and eventually has the tables turned on him by one of the girls of the party in a purely psychological manner—that's "The Ship From Shanghai."

This production directed by Charles Brabin is unusual enough in setting and ideas at this stage of talkie-making to command considerable interest. Kay Johnson, Conrad Nagel, Louis Wolheim, Carmel Myers and others are principals, but it is Wolheim's glad day. He portrays the steward, the dominant character in the plot.

Miss Johnson is immensely effective in her dramatic scenes, and has several bigger moments, especially in the situation where she convinces the steward of his utter and preposterous madness in attempting to become aught but an "under dog."

"The Ship From Shanghai" was adapted from the novel, "Ordeal," by Dale Collins, and the uniqueness of its appeal is intensified by the excellent storm effects, which leave the yacht a virtual wreck. The adventurous character of its story is interesting.

In addition to the players already mentioned, very efficacious performances are given by Zeffie Tilbury, Holmes Herbert and Ivan Linow

FEW ARE FAT IN THESE DAYS

THERE'S A REASON

Have you noted how few people are now over-fat, as compared with years ago? Slender figures are the vogue. And they have brought to millions new youth and beauty, new health and vigor.

Look about you in any crowd, and you will realize that some new factor has been found. People are not starving to reduce. They are combating the cause of obesity, which usually lies in an under-active gland. Modern science has discovered the remedy, and physicians the world over now employ it.

A famous medical laboratory embodies the method in Marmola prescription tablets. People have used them for 22 years—millions of boxes of them. They have told the results to others. So countless people now reduce in this right and easy way.

The Marmola prescription is not secret. A book in each box states the formula, and explains the results. Your own doctor would probably prescribe the same help if you asked him.

No abnormal exercise or diet. Simply take four tablets of Marmola daily until your loss of fat proves that the cause is corrected.

Try Marmola, if you need it. Do this in fairness to yourself, your family and friends. Correct this wrong condition and note the amazing results. Life will bring you many new joys when you cease to overweigh. Start today.

Marmola prescription tablets are sold by all druggists at $1 a box. Any druggist who is out will gladly order for you.

BARTHELMESS AT HIS BEST IN "Son of the Gods"

Constance Bennett and Anders Randolf are both responsible for excellent portrayals.

Sam Lee learns his true nationality from the San Francisco policeman, while the faithful Eileen is a happy spectator. Barthelmess, Mildred Van Dorn and Thomas Homans.

By WHITNEY WILLIAMS

"YOU are a son of the gods," Lee Ying, his honored father, told him, "sent in answer to prayer." Yet tragedy, pain, disillusionment stalked as his constant companions.

"Son of the Gods" is Richard Barthelmess' latest picture. Its plot is taken from the story by Rex Beach, and in its narration on the screen is disclosed a tale of well-told poignancy. Accepted instantly wherever he might choose to go—yet shunned the moment it was learned he was a Chinaman! Sam Lee's life, in brief.

Barthelmess, in his Chinese role, rises to heights he has seldom attained. The very nature of the part assures an excellent portrayal in the hands of a capable actor—and the star makes the most of the opportunities.

Frank Lloyd directed the film, and his customary touches of brilliance are evident time and again, elevating the production to a high plane. The picture is probably the most presentable to come forth from the First National studios during the past season, and no finer performance than Barthelmess', among the players on that lot, has been viewed. The actor's work is highly commendable, both for its sincerity and for the ease with which he slips into the character of a high-born Chinese.

Supporting the star is a cast of merit, with Constance Bennett appearing as Barthelmess' leading lady. Mildred Van Dorn, E. Alyn Warren, Anders Randolf and Claude King have important roles, and others are Frank Albertson, Dorothy Matthews, Barbara Leonard, Jimmy Eagle, King Hou Chang, Geneva Mitchell and Ivan Christie.

The effect of pathos is heightened materially by the use of music, in the scene where the son returns from abroad to find his father dead. This is the most emotional scene in the picture, and has been handled, by both director and star, with laudable restraint.

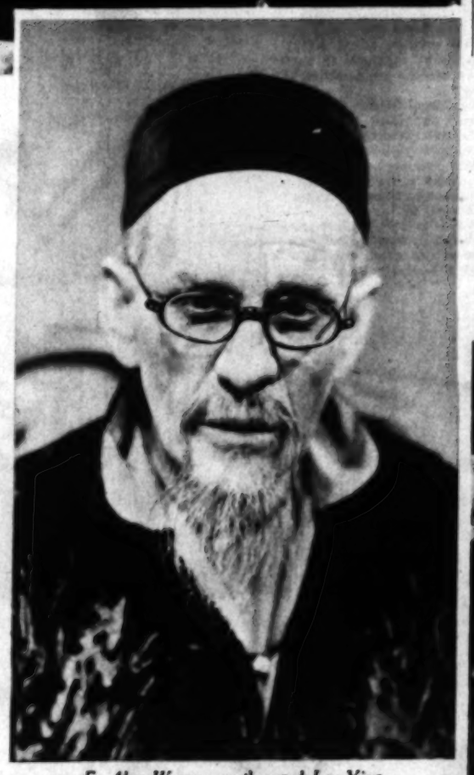
In the end, one learns that Barthelmess, as Sam Lee, is not an Oriental. Lee Ying, a wealthy Chinese merchant, discovered him as a foundling in San Francisco, and, having prayed for a son, has reared him as his own. To avoid trouble with the authorities, he brought him to New York as a child.

Audiences will anticipate this situation, no doubt—if the thought occurs to them. A conventional way to end the story, certainly, but it proves acceptable. There is apt, however, to be comment anent this means of bringing the picture to a close, among the more critical. Considering the attitude of the majority of Americans toward the Oriental races, though, the film could not have ended tastefully any other way, with the girl coming to Sam Lee and insisting that he marry her.

Miss Bennett, in her role of a rich girl who falls in love with Sam, horse-whipping him in public when she learns his identity and later realizing she cannot live without him, is a figure of considerable charm. It is somewhat inconceivable, however, that a girl of breeding and intelligence would seek out, in a public place, the man she thought had tricked her and beat him with her riding crop.

E. Alyn Warren, as Lee Ying, offers an exceptionally smooth performance, and Mildred Van Dorn, a newcomer on the screen, also is outstanding, to single out but two of the cast. The remaining members likewise are excellent.

Screen story and dialogue were written by Bradley King. One of the sequences, a flashback, is photographed in color.



E. Alyn Warren, as the aged Lee Ying, is remarkably effective.

OH, THE IRISH AND THE SCOTCH

The partnership of Charles Murray, as Michael Clancy, and Lucien Littlefield, as Andy McIntosh, is the basis for innumerable laughs.

Presenting the vagaries of two plumbers, one of whom makes money on the stock market and later loses, "Clancy Caught Short," produced by Edward Small and co-starring Charles Murray and Lucien Littlefield, is a screen recital of amusing events in the lives of the partners that should elicit much response on the part of the public.

Contrast is the comedy is effected in the romances between Miriam Seegar and Edmund Nugent.

Charles Murray, the life of the Caledonian Club after partaking of some twenty-year Scotch.

WITHIN SIX MONTHS.. PROVE THAT YOU CAN PREVENT PRACTICALLY ALL TOOTH DECAY

Acid-forming germs cause decay. The more places they have in which to collect and multiply the more decay. Notice the photographs at the left. The lower one is a greatly magnified picture of a colony of decay germs attached to the tooth enamel. Your tooth-brush can't dislodge these microscopic germs in the crevices and fissures between your teeth and on the grinding surfaces. But you can neutralize the germ acids with Squibb's Dental Cream and thus prevent decay. The two upper photographs show: (1) decay and abscess of the root of the tooth; (2) gingival decay . . . all the work of germs.

Thousands have found Squibb's Dental Cream the finest of all protection against cavities and gum troubles. Its formula definitely recognizes the cause of decay and the best ways to prevent it

HAVE you come to look on tooth decay as unavoidable? Do your teeth seem to get worse and worse?

Then try this. Use Squibb's Dental Cream for six months and see if you aren't astonished, on your next visit to the dentist, at the improved condition of your teeth and gums.

Germs cause decay. In a clean mouth they do little harm. But when fermenting food particles are left in the mouth they provide food for these germs which then multiply by the millions and generate the destructive acids which eat away the tooth enamel.

The Danger Line is the imaginary line where gums meet teeth. As long as this knife-like edge of gum tissue keeps healthy, pyorrhea will not occur. Nor will tooth decay spread beyond it and attack the sensitive neck of the tooth. In the cross-section above, notice the tiny crevice at each side of the tooth. The arrows show it. Food particles collect here, ferment and irritate the gums with acids. Eventually the delicate gum edge recedes and then The Danger Line is no longer a protection. Never let this happen.

Don't think, though, that merely brushing the teeth will clean your mouth sufficiently. Your tooth-brush can't reach between your teeth, nor into the tiny pits and fissures, nor can it thoroughly clean at the gum margin, where there is a tiny crevice to catch stray bits of food. As a result, decay germs attack your teeth at all these places—destroy the enamel. If neglected long enough, you may lose the teeth affected and suffer seriously in general health.

Ordinary tooth-pastes and methods are powerless. But here is where Squibb's Dental Cream demonstrates its superiority. It is made with 50% of Squibb's Milk of Magnesia. Plenty of this safe, effective antacid to penetrate crevices, neutralize fermenting-food-particles and render the destructive germ acids harmless. To protect even where the tooth-brush fails to reach.

In addition, Squibb's definite soothing quality helps keep the delicate gum tissues firm and sound. It guards The Danger Line, where gums meet teeth. And as long as this vital line remains healthy pyorrhea will not occur. Squibb's cleans your teeth thoroughly and safely. Never by the use of pastes or astringents—which might injure the delicate gum edge.

Why not see your dentist soon and let him professionally clean your teeth and gums and treat any cavities you may now have. Then use Squibb's Dental Cream regularly and thoroughly . . . and it will keep your teeth and gums safe and sound. Prove it during the coming six months.

Liquid: Some ambroid cement and some banana oil for sticking paper to surfaces to be covered.

Study the drawings before beginning to work. Do not attempt to make your plane entirely from the drawing but follow the text and the drawing together. Remember, The Times-Playground instruction school leader will give you whatever assistance you may need, so do not be afraid to ask questions when at the class meeting.

FUSELAGE

Make the fuselage first. It is triangular in shape and consists of three longerons connected together by short braces. Place the two top fuselage sticks, size 1-8x1-8x24 inches side by side on the table. Pin the noses down forming the front end of the fuselage and 2 7-8 inches from this end ambroid a 7-8x1-8x1-8 cross brace, section No. 4. Cut all cross braces from the two remaining 1-8x1-8x24-inch longerons.

Now bring the opposite ends of the top longerons together and ambroid. The result is a stream-lined shape similar to the fuselage shape shown in the plan view of the drawing. Next locate the top cross pieces of sections Nos. 3, 2 and by measuring from the nose of the fuselage distances of 8, 13 3-4 and 18 3-4 inches. The section drawings show that No. 4 top brace is 7-8 inches long; No. 3 is 2 1-4 inches long, No. 2 is 3 3-16 inches long, and No. 1 brace is 1 3-16 inches long. Ambroiding the top cross braces in place completes the top of the fuselage.

By referring to the sketch of the rear fuselage you will note that although No. 4 section is the last fuselage section, there is a small top brace size, 11-16x1-8x1-8, placed 1½ inches behind section No. 4 and connecting the two top longerons. Also there is a side brace on the left side of the fuselage connecting the top longeron and the bottom longeron.

Complete section No. 4 by cutting and ambroiding in place the two side braces. By doing the same with section pieces No. 3, 2 and 1 (referring to the cross section drawings for their lengths) we will have to put on the lower longeron and nose piece to complete our fuselage frame.

Attach one end of the lower longeron by ambroiding and wrapping with thread, to the tail end of the fuselage. Now bend it carefully for its entire length and ambroid at those points where it comes in contact with the bottom of the section.

To get a good stream-line shape and the needed strength for the fuselage, make certain that the cross braces are of just the right length and that all joints are very firmly ambroided.

To make the nose piece, which fits over the front end of the fuselage and through which the propeller shaft rotates, proceed as follows: Obtain a piece of aluminum about 1-16 inch thick; 3-16 wide, and 2 inches long. Measure in from each end 5-8 of an inch and bend to the shape shown in the detail drawing. Pierce a small hole just slightly larger than the propeller shaft and a little below the center of the nose piece. Cap the aluminum nose piece over the fuselage ends, ambroid and wrap with thread.

Make a tail hook of the shape shown in the drawing, slip over the tail end of fuselage and fasten in place. The tail hook should be so placed that the loop (to which the "S" motor hook catches) is on the right-hand side of the fuselage.

THE LANDING GEAR

The landing gear is very simple to make. It consists of two pieces of bamboo each eight inches long by one-eighth wide by one-sixteenth inch thick. Ptrnish ambroid to the side braces of section No. 4 as shown in the front view of the assembly drawing. With your long-nose pliers and some piano wire bend two 2-4-inch pieces to make the landing-gear axles as shown on landing-gear detail. Ambroid in place and lash with thread at tips of bamboo landing-gear struts.

RUDDER AND STABILIZER

Figure 1 of drawing shows exactly how the tail surfaces are made and assembled. The stabilizer and rudder frames are made of 1-8x3-32-inch balsa. To make the stabilizer, cut two pieces 2 3-4 inches long, one piece 12 inches long, two pieces 6 1-8 inches long and one piece 2 3-8 inches long. Ambroid together by butt jointing into the shape shown in plan view of drawing. Cover one side only with Japanese silk tissue, using banana oil to fasten paper to frame.

To make the rudder, cut four pieces of balsa, making two pieces 4 inches long, one piece 2 3-4 inches long and the other 2 3-8 inches. Fasten together in the shape shown in elevation drawing and cover on one side.

To assemble tail group, glue the rudder across the center spar of the stabilizer and brace with thread as indicated in sketch of Figure 1.

PROPELLER

Carve a right-handed propeller from out of the 12x1 1-4x1-inch balsa. Make the blank exactly as shown on the drawing before doing any carving. This propeller is considerably thicker at the blade than the propeller you made for the indoor pusher. Carve until the blades are about 3-32-inch thick and then sandpaper to a 1-16-inch thickness. Be sure to balance the propeller before mounting on the shaft; for a brief detailed explanation for carving a propeller, refer to last Sunday's lesson.

METAL FITTINGS

Metal fittings consist of a propeller shaft, rear tail hook and an "S" hook. Drawing "B" gives the full size shapes of these fittings. Make them exactly to the shape of the drawing. They are all made of about 3-64-inch diameter steel piano wire.

THE WING

Successful flight of your model will depend more upon how well your wing is made than upon anything else. It is the most difficult part of the plane to build, so to obtain best results, read the instructions carefully and do your work accurately.

(1.) Start by reproducing the full-size wing curve. If you wish, you may cut it out of the lesson, without going to the extra work of reproducing it. Glue to a piece of thin sheet metal and cut out very accurately. If you have no means of cutting sheet metal, you may use a piece of very stiff cardboard or fiber in place of the sheet metal. The cut-out wing curve is called a template and it is used as a pattern to cut out the wing sections. From the 24x2x1-16-inch balsa, cut out eleven wing sections, being careful to make them all exactly alike. Pile one on top of the other and temporarily fasten together by sticking a couple of straight pins through them.

Fasten in a vise and, with a coping saw, slit the noses of the ribs (as per drawing) to a depth of 1-4 of an inch for the entering edge spar. Now 1 3-4 inches back from the nose, on the rib bottom, make a similar notch for the center spar. Notch all ribs alike but one. This rib, to be used in the center of the wing, must have a 9-32 of an inch wide notch at the bottom. Next notch the trailing ends of the ribs as per drawing.

(2.) Putting dihedral angle in wing: Obtain three pieces of 3-32x1-4x28-inch balsa for entering, trailing, and center wing spar. Put a 2½-inch total dihedral angle in the wing in the following manner. Find the exact center of the entering and trailing spars and from this point measure off 1-4 inch on each side and mark. Now gently saw through the wood at this point, breaking the spars in two. Pin one half of each spar on the table and raise the other end until it is 2¼ inches above the spar center. Put a block under it and drop some ambroid at the center, where the spar has been bent.

Since the center spar is on edge when assembled in the wing, we cannot bend it but must cut through at the center and fasten together. Cut the spar in two pieces at the center, level the connecting ends so as to make the 2¼ total dihedral angle and ambroid together by placing a splint on both sides of the broken pieces.

(3.) There remains but to assemble the wing; assemble one-half at the time. Starting with the center rib, place the rib on the center spar and locate the other rib sections. Now insert entering spar in slit on ribs and locate notched ends of ribs, on trailing spar. Ambroid all joints and leave dry. If necessary, while the ambroid is drying, put a light weight across the top of the ribs to hold them in place. Complete the other side of wing assembly in the same manner.

(4.) Covering the wing smoothly, with no wrinkles is important and to do it properly follow directions accurately. Japanese silk tissue is used for covering the wing. Banana oil is used to fasten the paper to the wing. Cover first the top of the wing, then the bottom. Paint the center rib with banana oil and stretch the edge of the paper across the top from trailing edge to leading edge.

Let the paper overlap the trailing edge about 1-16 inch which is later turned under. The rest of the paper should extend past the leading edge far enough to fold under and completely cover the bottom of the wing. As soon as the center rib is dry, the frame is painted up to and including the next rib and this section covered. Be certain to draw the paper tight while fastening in place. The entire wing is covered in the same manner.

In covering a wing, always work from the center to the tips. If you stretch and hold your paper in place wrinkles can be prevented. After finishing the top of the wing

ASSEMBLING THE MODEL

The model derives its power from eight or ten strands of 1-8-inch flat rubber which winds continually around the propeller shaft loop and an "S" hook, one end of which fastens to the rear hook. From the 1-16-inch sheet balsa cut out two circular discs for wheels. Give each a coat of ambroid to strengthen.

Fasten the tail surfaces to the fuselage by passing a rubber strand over the stabilizer and under the fuselage. The wing fastens to the body in a similar manner. The position of the wing on the fuselage is determined by varying the location of the wing until a good gliding flight is obtained.

FLYING THE MODEL

After adjusting the plane until it glides evenly, make a trial flight with about 100 winds on the motor. If the ship is a bit tail heavy, put a little positive angle of incidence in the stabilizer by inserting a 3-32-inch block between the fuselage, and entering edge of the stabilizer.

Charmingly sweet creation
Fragrant fragile one,
Oh, must you wilt and die so soon
When life is yet so young?

Of beauty, youth and form;
But soon, so soon and sad, so sad
Abandoned and forlorn.

Ah, pure and fragrant lily,
Symbol of peace and light,
Pray tell me why you die so soon,
That I may mend thy plight.

TWO BRAND-NEW STORIES ARE COMING; OTHER FEATURES ALSO PLANNED

More and better features in The Junior Times! That's our plan. Next week, for instance, there will be another picture by Laura Brock in our fascinating serial on "Mysterious China," to be followed by others in quick array.

Which reminds us, "The Cracked Mirror" is coming to a close. A few more weeks, and you will be asked to solve this baffling mystery story. Many extra points will go to the lucky member, who thinks up the most laughable ending. Then comes our new and delightful serial, "The Black Ace," a yarn so new, so novel, so ingenious in plot that you will hold your breath from week to week.

Our beloved Squirmy also is making his way into Story-Book-Land, giving you chuckles galore in the funny section. But do not grieve; he is only vacationing. Presently, he will return, in a sequel to "The Magic City."

Soon a new children's serial will be published in the Junior. The name is "Snoopy Long Ears," the sweetest story ever told.

Snoopy is as lovable, naughty, foolish, and delightful as your deep-sea hero, Squirmy-Turn, so watch for this serial by Aunt Dolly, and the unusually gorgeous illustrations accompanying this, by Guy Alden, a newly discovered Junior. His conception of the "Painted River," the "Forbidden Walls," and the "Black Mountains" are so strikingly beautiful you will clamor for his work as eagerly as you do for the story itself. So watch for Snoopy Long Ears, the timid, bewildered little rabbit, who is feared by Queen Saga, the cat. Her cruelty, her plotting, her tricks and ruthless methods will give you thrill upon thrill.

END AIR SCHOOL WINTER COURSE

Spring Session Coming, So Watch for Announcement—Give Details on Building Special Outdoor Fuselage Model

BY LOUIS A. ORSATTI,
Los Angeles Playground and Recreation Department

HOW TO BUILD THE SPECIAL OUTDOOR FUSELAGE MODEL

The model airplane described in today's lesson is a consistently good flyer. It differs from the models you have been making in that it has a double-surfaced wing, built up fuselage, and is decidedly a model for outdoor flying.

Byron Beanfield, the builder of this model, has established a Pacific Coast distance record of over 2100 feet with a model of this design. Unbelievable as it may seem, Byron has actually flown a model similar to today's fuselage model for one hour and three minutes. Of course, these flights are exceptional, but if you follow directions carefully, and do a good job, your model should do from 800 to 1200 feet very easily.

Before beginning work on the outdoor fuselage model assemble together all the necessary parts, and materials. You will need the following materials:

Wood: Five pieces of balsa, 24 inches long by 1-8 inch square, to be used for fuselage longerons and braces. Three pieces of balsa, size 36x3-32 1-4 inches for wing center spar, entering and trailing edges. One piece of 1-32x1-8x36 inches balsa for tail surfaces. One piece of 1-16x8x24 inches flat sheet balsa for wing ribs. One balsa propeller block size 1x1-4x12 inches. Two pieces of bamboo size 1-8x1-16x8 inches for landing gear.

FABRIC AND METAL

Two sheets of Japanese silk tissue for covering wing and fuselage. Twenty feet of 1-8-inch flat rubber strand for motor. Twelve inches of 3-64-inch diameter piano wire for propeller shaft, rear hook, "S" hook and for axles. Two 1-4-inch diameter brass washers to use as a bearing to reduce friction between propeller and propeller hanger. Four 1-4-inch diameter dress spangle washers for landing gear wheels. One piece of aluminum 1-16 inch thick, 2 inches long and 3-16 inches

CANDLESTICK SALAD

By Betty May Keeley, Brentwood Heights

Place a slice of pineapple on a lettuce leaf, and then stand one-half of a banana in an upright position in the hole of the pineapple. Then thoroughly mix together one teaspoonful of mayonnaise with enough pineapple juice so that the mixture is thin enough to pour easily. Then pour this mixture over the banana. This is supposed to represent the melted tallow of the candle. Then cut a green bell-pepper in long narrow strips. Take one of these strips and dig the ends into the upright banana, one near the top and one further below—have it curve slightly to represent the handle of the candle-stick. Now dig a tiny hole out of the top of the banana and place in it a French cherry—this is to represent the flame of the candle.

This recipe is sufficient for one person only.

This is a very pretty and dainty salad, and really delicious as well. It would be ideal to serve during the holiday season or any birthday celebration.

Aunt Dolly's Letter Box

Dear Aunt Dolly:

We wanted you to know that your fanciful story, "The Magic City," is being enjoyed here by the younger children. We all think the illustrations are most clever, and too, we have had a great deal of pleasure from the cartoons in the same paper by the same illustrator, Ed Shultz. May we hope to have more of the kind?

Very truly yours,

[Signed] SISTER MARY,
Convent of the Good Shepherd, Cincinnati, O.

Dear Aunt Dolly:

I have been a constant reader of your column and newspaper, The Junior Times, for more than a year. I have enjoyed reading your various articles and poems by your industrious juniors.

I want to tell you that I want to join your club. I am 15 years of age and a sophomore in the Hilo High School. My favorite hobby is writing poems and short stories, and several of my poems have been accepted by the Hilo Tribune Herald, our local paper.

I know that the boys and girls who have joined your Junior Times are worthy of the position they have, and I would like to make myself worthy too, by joining your club, which is opened to those who wish to join. Good-by, Aunt Dolly; I'll be waiting for the application blank, and when it comes, I will immediately fill it in and mail it back to you. Then I hope to start earning my points as a member of The Junior Times.

Affectionately yours,

[Signed] GEORGE FERREIRA,
Mt. View, Hawaii.

Dear Aunt Dolly:

Imagine aunt, I was very much delighted for receiving me as one of the lucky ones to get a copy of the Junior when it is published. I have enjoyed reading all the interesting stories and poems by the Junior Times readers, and I am sending herewith my first experience in a big forest when I was a greenhorn, entitled, "A Night Adventure." It is a humorous autobiography of my first night in a big forest. Do not be surprised if it is uninteresting, for I am telling it in my own way, and I am not well versed in writing. These works will be my first effort to write a sketch of my own adventures. More to follow if you like the sample. I will be very much obliged if you will send me some advice concerning manuscripts. If it is worth publishing, will you be kind enough to send me a copy of the Junior when it is. I will pay the necessary postage.

I will be waiting for precious moments for an answer. I hope you and all your pen pals are well. Extend my greetings and good will to them all. I am healthy and sound as ever. Good-by.

Dear Aunt Dolly:

I received the $2 check and I am tickled red, white and blue over it. It does feel so nice to know I am good for something. In this letter I'm sending a poem, "Shooting High." It is really suitable for any season. "Are You Thankful?" was the poem I wrote for Thanksgiving week. I wrote "Just Supposing" when I felt in the mood for nonsense. Dear Aunt Dolly:

I have decided to keep all my copies of The Junior Times and make a volume of them. But I've just started, and I have discovered that some of my most important data has been thrown away, including the two or three copies that described the merit system. Will you please tell me what the "T.J.W." stands for, and just how many of these badges there are to win?

Your loving niece,

Dear Aunt Dolly:

You will be surprised to receive my unexpected letter. Be as it is for your club is well advertised by my close friend in our campus. I am eager to enter and be your member. I am a first-year student of this high school. I have spent a rough life in the jungle. Our home place is Mabini, Salay, Misamis. I hope I will be a member of your club in the next mail.

I am, yours truly,

[Signed] EUSEBIO B. ECHANO
Cagayan, Misamis, P. I.

Dear Aunt Dolly:

I thank you very much for the $2 check you sent me. It was certainly a wonderful surprise.

Frances and I were so happy to receive your Christmas letter. We both are going to try and be more prompt, also we are going to do our very best work from now on.

I cannot draw very well, at least I am afraid not quite good enough to have anything accepted for publication, so I am inclosing a little recipe for a candle-stick salad. I learned to make this salad in school, and it is really very pretty to serve, and delicious as well. I am also inclosing a little poem.

The story, "Honey Country Twins," by Margaret Kostowal, is a knockout, and "The Magic City" is just wonderful. Poor Squirmy is always getting into trouble, but I think he is awfully cute just the same.

I wonder if you could let us know how many points both Frances and I have now. I would like to know.

Mother and daddy are very happy to have us belong to The Junior Times Club, and want us to do better work.

Thank you again for your sweet letter.

Lovingly, your pal,

[Signed] BETTY MAY KEELEY,
Brentwood Heights.

Dear Aunt Dolly:

You can't imagine how happy I was when I spied the mailman putting a blue envelope into our mail box. I rushed out and opened it quicker than you can say "blue envelope."

Mother wonders how it can take me so long to look through the Junior. But if she only knew how many interesting things are hidden in it. I just go right through it, without missing a solitary thing.

Aunt Dolly, won't you please tell me how many points I have, so that I'll know how far I am from that gold star of 200 points? Thanks for going through all the trouble.

I wrote a Christmas poem, entitled "Christmas Eve." Do you think it's any good, Auntie?

Loads of love,

The Magic City by Aunt Dolly

ILLUSTRATED BY ED SHULTZ

"You black-hearted, gray-whiskered villain," shouted Peter, as Puss in Boots lunged toward him. "I'll teach you a lesson," and he jerked out his dagger, which spouted sparks from its tip. "Take that, and that," shouted the fairy boy, beating Puss over the head with it. "Now, you cowardly creature, fight fist to fist." But this last made a foolish one. Puss merely wrinkled up his lips, then, with bared claws, fell upon Peter, who struck the deck, with a resounding whack. But no one had noticed them in the general turmoil.

Gandy Goose had flung her shawl overboard, and, minus cap and spectacles was pecking viciously at Mallard cat.

"You," she spat, "measly, stealer of chicks, this for you," and she bit, until the cat put his tail between his legs, and flunk off. "Now," panted Gandy, with gleaming eyes, "next"—but the enemy had withdrawn to the main mast, talking in low tones. Fleeting, Peter said, some new and beautiful island. Lila was shaking with fear, and Capt. Hook's arm was thick with fur. He rolled his eyes in a pirately way, hoping to frighten the cats.

"Wreck ahoy," shouted Peter, as Puss strode toward them, "there is trouble afoot."

"Oh, wise and gracious Magician," shrieked their leader, doffing his hat to Peter, "will you hear our bargain?"

"Do not call me magician. I am Peter, who lived in Never Never Land, with Wendy, and other lost boys, created by some one, who loved little children. I am just myself—and being that, am willing to listen to you." Peter thought his speech was unusually fine, so he cried, "Cock-a-me-look," which amused Puss immensely.

"My bargain is this," whined the cat, "there's a nest by the mast—an ordinary looking nest. If you can turn it into an emerald, we will call you a wizard, and let you go free. Pleasuring me," mumbled the fairy boy, and looked at Hook, who saw danger in the proposition. But Lila was delighted with the idea.

"You made Gold-Tail and this ship," she cried, "surely you can create an emerald."

"Yes," grumbled Peter, "and what happened to Gold-Tail? As for this ship, look at it. Run by cats, and what not."

Puss in Boots glanced at him in anger. "Very well," he purred, "have it your way. We will give you another chance." And he lifted his paw, directing fifty of his men to lift the red beaver. As it was dragged over the deck, Capt. Hook gave a warning cry, which, undoubtedly, saved their lives. The treacherous cats had crawled under the nest, and were about to throw it over them, holding them prisoners. Lila saw the danger, and leaped to the railing. Gandy squawked in fear, and followed, while Squirmy took a straight dive into the ocean. Hook was the last to leave. He grasped Lila's hand, comfortingly as they dove from the side of the ship.

"Cazooks, rats' tails and mice," growled Puss in Boots, as he beheld them bobbing about in the waves. "If I hated water less, I'd follow them." Peter, swimming bravely beside Lila, made a naughty face,

"Oh, you, who love to get wet, come after us!" he teased, then, "where is Bungle-Bug?" "Goodness knows," wept Squirmy, "if I have lost her, not even new clothes can make me content." And he buried his nose in the sea, hoping he might find her paddling about. But it was useless, the Bungle-Bug had completely disappeared.

"Where are we?" cried Lila, "there's no land in sight, and I'm growing so tired." Hook put his good arm about her. "Keep going," he advised "something may happen," and no sooner did the words leave his mouth, than Rosebeam, looking her prettiest, parted the waves, and smiled at him.

"Hey you," Squirmy cried, joyfully, "give us a hand, will you? Lila's worn out—can't keep going."

"Better than that," promised Rosebeam, in a mysterious manner, and, before Lila could wink her eye, the ocean grew silver with fish. There are gray ones, and black ones, speckled ones, brown. There were so many, they made a carpet for her to stand upon.

"Well I never," chuckled Squirmy, "that comes of having friends. I'm deeply obliged, my dear. Which way are we going?"

"To an island," promised Rosebeam, sitting astride a baby carp, "Neptune did this for you. He's so wild over Lila, we would give her the ocean, and all its treasures, if she asked for them." The Princess started, and paled, feeling distrust, but not daring to show it.

"That's nice of him," she said, guardedly, Rosebeam looked at her with twinkling eyes.

"You don't like him," she said, "but Neptune has changed. He's a very sick man. All the cruel deeds he has committed are slowly, but surely, killing him. Only one thing can cure him—he must live decently. He wouldn't dare mistreat you."

"Hope he gets well," sniffed Capt. Hook, "where is this island you mentioned?"

"There, can't you see it? That thimble of smoke is a fire, waiting to dry your chilled bones. Neptune thought of that."

"Great luck," wheezed Squirmy, "but, would you keep an eye out for Bungle-Bug, she's gone. First it's one, and then one of the others. Such people as we seem to be."

"Certainly," promised Rosebeam, "and now, I must go. My time is up. I'll give your respects to our King, and hope you sleep well on the island." With that, she vanished, the carpet of fish speeding swiftly toward the spot Neptune had prepared for them.

"THE SOWER" DIES

Years ago a French artist named Rety saw a barefooted girl in the field. He gave her a few coins to pose for him and the result was "The Sower," a famous picture which for many years appeared on coins and which still appears on postage stamps in that country. Years passed by and the barefooted girl became an old woman. She was poor and asked the government for a pension, but nobody then would believe her story, and so she died, recently, in abject poverty. After her death she was identified as the true model of "The Sower."—[The Pathfinder.

The Cracked Mirror

The next morning at 11 o'clock, Tommy's door opened, and a furtive-eyed individual entered. Angela followed him, with a bowl of roses in her arms.

"You know this gentleman," she remarked, "Dr. Markadon sent for Mr. Jack on Canal street." For an instant, the man measured Tommy carefully, then shook his head.

"You say you know me?" he asked, rubbing oily hands, "you sold me a suit—when?"

The boy was clearly at a loss, unable to place his visitor. He shaded his eyes, with a hand that trembled visibly.

"It was in the month of October, on the 12th—at 3 o'clock in the afternoon," he said.

Memory narrowed crafty eyes. "You have been very sick," he remarked, patronizingly, "a touch of fever does things to a person's imagination."

Tommy caught the inference in his words, and flushed painfully. "What you trying to do?" he demanded, hoarsely, "railroad me, without giving me a chance to identify Chico's suit? You can't do it. When I get out of here, I'll bust you clean open. Anyway, you're tricking me—you must be Mr. Jack's partner—I never saw you before." Tommy caught a warning glance from Angela's blue eyes. She was beseeching him to be quiet.

"You mustn't excite yourself," she cautioned, "doctor's orders. It will come out all right, if you keep your head."

"But to take slams from that weasel," stormed Tommy, "I tell you, Angela, I'm not the easy-going

THE ADVENTURES OF BALAO

By Carl Kondo, Los Angeles

II

Balao the monkey was restless. He wanted to be alone. Balao saw his chance, his mother's back was turned in his direction, so he quickly scampered into the underbrush and disappeared. Balao the small one was happy, as he swung from tree to tree. Balao went deeper and deeper into the jungle, looking for adventure.

The torrid African sun beat down on a clearing that overlooked a small bay on the African west coast. The grasses at the edge of the clearing swayed, and a white man emerged, followed by several black "boys." In the center of the clearing they stood talking. High in the branches of a gigantic bombay tree, a small face peered down. Balao was interested. The white had lit a cigarette; they then left.

Balao in the tree trembled in excitement, some silvery thing had dropped from the white man's pocket. He dropped down and picked it up. Balao recognized it as something that the queer being had held, and had rubbed to make a strange red flower grow in his hand. Balao wished to do so, he rubbed it but nothing happened. He tried again, and in doing so opened the match box, some fell out. He picked them up and rubbed the box, they burst in flame. Balao was elated; they had grown! He touched it with his finger, and it bit him! He dropped them, howling.

Balao fled to the highest tree, whimpering. Safe in the tree, Balao turned to look at the red flower. Balao was amazed, the flower was eating the grass, and the more it ate the larger it grew. Suddenly the red flower spoke, in a harsh snapping tone. It blew a hot breath at Balao. It advanced swiftly, roaring. Balao fled in fear, the snapping, crackling sound, filled him with fright.

The jungle became full of noises, all the wild creatures were fleeing the dreaded forest fire. Gorillas, apes, baboons and monkeys fled by the high trees. The lion and the deer, the panther and the wild dog, fled side by side, so great was their panic. The birds of the air fled.

A flaming spark leaped in the high wind that had sprung from the coast and set fire to a tall odum tree, directly ahead of Balao, who turned and fled in another direction. Sparks were flying in a steady stream, down the wind. The jungle flamed with fiery red tongues, that shrivelled and burned everything it touched. The jungle noises were drowned by the loud ominous and steady roar that swept through the forest.

A cold breath of wind swept suddenly through the jungle, and the sky rapidly became overcast. A few rain drops fell. Abruptly a loud howl went through the flaming forest, and a ninety-mile gale smote the jungle. Trees swayed, and branches fell, in the terrific wind. The heavy rain-laden clouds burst, deluging the jungle with tons

Standing in front of the door from which the sobbing came, Joe stood very still and listened for a few moments. He wanted to make sure that the little boy was alone.

He tried the knob of the door, but it was locked. Keenly disappointed, he flashed his light up and down the corridor, and found that there was another door just across the hall from where he stood. He saw his hand, and descended into this door, and Joe eagerly seized it, and tried it in the other door. It fit perfectly and the door swung quickly inward.

The sobbing ceased. The little boy's large bright eyes looked startled into Joe's, and Joe was breathless with surprise at what he saw.

The little boy was tied securely to a chair with a large rope. A handkerchief had been tied across his mouth, but apparently this had slipped out of place and it hung now loosely about his neck.

Joe swiftly cut the boy's bonds with his knife but the boy was so weak that he couldn't move from the chair.

"How long have you been there?" Joe asked him.

"Oh, I don't know, it must have been last night when they put me here. Let's go away, before they come back," he cried, frantically.

Joe picked the little fellow up in his arms and hurried down the corridor to the tunnel and through the tunnel to the opening where Jean gazed at them wide-eyed.

"Let's run," said Joe, and for the first time since he entered the tunnel, he was really and truly scared.

The children ran straight for home and tore into the kitchen.

Mother stood and stared at the three of them, and Joe, relieved to be in the safety of his own home again, cried gayly, "We brought you another little boy, mother."

And next time you'll learn how this adventure ended.

VON COLEMAN, AIR ACE

By Gene R. Thompson, Santa Ana.

THE BARON LOSES

It was on the 13th day of February, when we four, veterans of the squadron, Duval, Eagle, Page and myself, formed the famous combine that was to bring disaster to more than one of the Kaiser's airmen. It was about 10 o'clock in the morning, just after I had returned from a scouting flight, that Duval, his arm now completely well, dropped into my hut, and sat down on my cot.

"Well?" I asked.

"I've been thinking," he answered.

"Yes?"

"There's only the four of us now."

"Four of what?"

"Four of the original squadron," he answered, slowly, "just you, Page, Eagle and me. It sort of occurred to me, we fellows ought to stick together. We'll be together tomorrow, I know."

"How come?"

"Going after those bombing planes, over Chavneau way, the place where we met the circus," he said. "It's going to be bad stuff, too. We may, some of us, go down."

About this time, Eagle, accompanied by Page, dropped in.

"We go after bombers at dawn," Page said, "just we four." They sat down.

Men who know that on the morrow, they may leave the light of day forever, men who know, that on the morrow, it's going to be them, or their buddy, are often moved to do strange things, and, so it was, our pact of friendship and allegiance was sealed.

The first light of dawn was dimly touching the horizon when we climbed into our planes and taxied down the field, and up into the clouds. We headed straight toward Chavneau and arrived above the village that was to serve as the German target at 6 o'clock. We didn't have long to wait, for, soon there appeared in the sky to the northeast, many specks, which grew larger and larger as they approached and turned out to be three German bombers, escorted by six small scout planes. We went straight toward them, climbing as we went, as they did also.

At last we came together. The ponderous bombing planes kept coming on steadily, while four of the scouting planes detached themselves and headed toward us. Eagle and Duval met them, while Page and I dashed by and pounced on the bombers. We got one of them, but in doing so, the two guarding planes were upon us. I noted with amazement how easily we shook them and came to the conclusion that they were new in the game, probably youths.

Young men, that was what they were, probably on their first flight; probably it was also destined to be their last.

All this ran through my mind as I roared down, and true to my duty, sent one of the youths hurtling earthward. Looking back over my shoulder, I saw that Duval and Eagle were fighting another bomber. But still steadily, the lone remaining bomber and its single novice protector went on. I finished the scout plane by one quick dive, and Page ended the career of the only remaining bomber.

We both came about and roared back to where Duval and Eagle were now engaging two planes. I wondered why the foolish Huns did not flee, and then, from my perch high above the four fighting planes, I saw the name, "Von Coleman," painted in huge black letters along the top of the wing of one of the German planes. Page and I dashed down, removing one of the Germans from the melee, and leaving only Von Coleman. He, naturally, turned tail and fled, and from then on it was a running fight.

I was leading Eagle, Duval and Page in the pursuit, and I first met Von Coleman when he turned to fight. He darted upward, and, quick as flash, back downward, his guns roaring. He ripped my fuselage, but I was unscathed. This time I was not to lose to Von Coleman, for, I, too, was an airman. I went far up into the sun and then dashed down at him. My guns penetrated his fuselage, and I had hit my mark, for, flinging up his arms, Von Coleman plunged earthward, just as Duval, Eagle and Page came up.

We watched the plane twist sickeningly down, and then, to our amazement, before the crash came, Von Coleman pulled out of it and glided down into a field. But he did not hold the aces this time, for, as the plane taxied along, it hit a ditch, and, with a roar and a crash, went straight up into the air on its nose, turning completely over frontward!

We were back at the squadron headquarters by 8 o'clock, and made our report. Truthfully, I could not say my victory in any way elated me. I had been obligated to Von Coleman, and, besides, somehow, I had come to respect him and to regard him almost in the light of a friend. But the next day a thing happened that, curiously enough, greatly relieved me.

Just as we four were climbing out of our planes, a daring German plane appeared over the hangars. We ducked quickly, expecting a bombardment, but, instead, only a large red rag, to which a rock was tied, fluttered to the ground, and the plane flew away. We rushed across the field and picked up the rag, which held a cylinder of paper on which was inscribed.

"To the man who shot down the Baron Von Coleman."

Duval handed it to me and I unrolled it, finding a note, which read:

"The Baron Von Coleman, to deprive you of the pleasure of believing you have killed him, tells me to inform you that, although he is severely injured, is far from dead, and will settle his account with you as soon as he recuperates.

(Signed)

"Dr. HENRY KLUKOW."

And, so Von Coleman is not yet dead. Perhaps I shall meet him again. But who am I to predict, or look forward to it, I, who helped to fight a nation's battles, above the clouds, either to destroy or to be destroyed?

Mrs. Phillip Phillips and Miss Davies Evans, twin sisters of Morristown, Wales, died within two days of each other and were buried together.

Germany exported nearly 40,000 tons of tools in 1929.

Varying the Monotony

"You were engaged for five years! Wasn't it rather boring?"

"No—it was not always the same man."

For descending seventy feet in a disused well and rescuing a sheep dog, Henry J. White of Bishop's Lydeard, Eng., has been presented a medal by the Royal Humane Society.

"GENTLE JULIA"
By Booth Tarkington
Reviewed by Carl Kendo, Los Angeles

This is a delightful book. One you will read again and again. It is humorous and abounds with interesting episodes. In this story Booth Tarkington portrays the character of a young girl, unmercifully, but with sympathy. At the same time he shows life in a small town; what they talk about, and the life of a girl who has many suitors, and is too gentle to discourage them.

Gentle Julia is a young maiden of twenty summers or winters, who cannot choose among her suitors the one to whom to bestow her hand, she likes them all collectively. Among her lovers are a middle-aged widower, a young poet just out of college, and Noble Dill. You will get the impression that half the town are her relatives, upon reading this book, for nearly all of their conversation is about Julia and her lovers. They have much to talk about, for mysteriously, word for word, everything Julia or her lovers do becomes known to her relatives!

Most of the book is about Florence, Julia's niece, and her nephew. Florence with her cousin as a cohelper gets into many humorous situations. Florence admires Noble Dill and tries to help him gain Aunt Julia's favor. How she unknowingly does so, is interesting and unusual. As you read the book, you will wonder who is the heroine, Florence or Julia?

An unusual hero is Noble Dill, meek, shy, the poorest man in town; yet you share his hopes, his joys and his griefs. When his great moment arrives, what he does will surprise you, just as it did me!

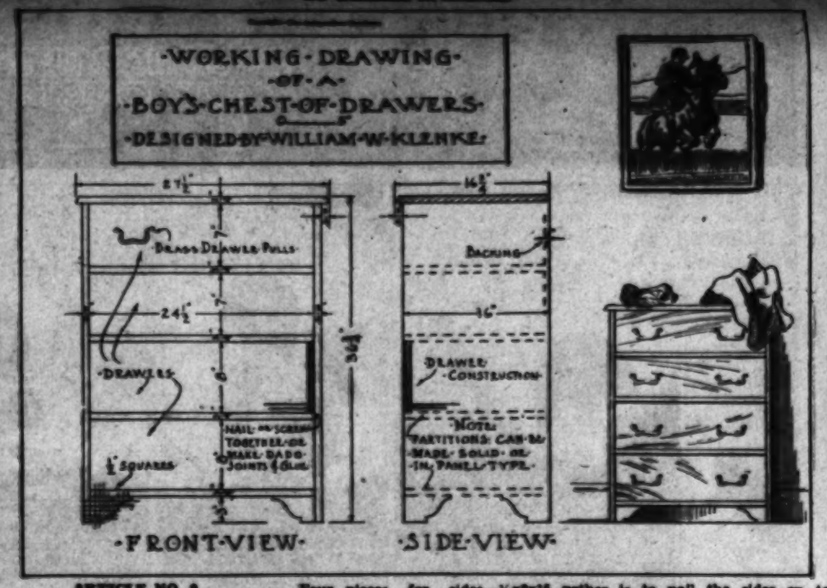
A Drawing Lesson

This little stunt shows how easy it really is to draw. To make the frog, start with the wiggly line at the upper left, then add the eye and leg, then the other lines, and you have it! The fish may be drawn in the same way, starting at the upper right.

"THINGS EASY TO MAKE"



ARTICLE NO. 9

BOYS' CHEST OF DRAWERS

Here is your chance, boys, to make mother happy, by building this chest of drawers for your own room. At last you will have plenty of space to keep your shirts, underclothing, collars, etc., and best of all, the job is an easy one.

What kind of material shall you use for this project? Well, I have had many similar pieces made by boys in my shop at school, out of common knotty pine. We often used the wood from large packing cases. Of course, you may want to make this piece match the rest of the set we have been making, or prefer to use some choice material.

You will require the following pieces of wood called "stock." The dimensions given will be finished measurements, which means that you must allow for planing the stock to the exact sizes and smooth surfaces.

Cabinet:
One piece for top—3-4x16 3-4x27½ inches.
Two pieces for sides—3-4x16x28 inches.
Two brackets—3-4x3x4½ inches.
Four pieces for partitions—3-4x15½x24½ inches.
One piece for back—½x25½x33 inches.
Drawers:
Two pieces for fronts—3-4x8x24½ inches.
Four pieces for sides—½x8x15 inches.
Four pieces for sides—½x7x15 inches.
Two pieces for back—½x7x24 inches.
Two pieces for back—½x6x24 inches.
Four pieces for bottoms—½x15x24 inches.

Step No. 1—The sides and top. Cut out the sides and top to the sizes indicated on the drawing, cutting the curved designs on the bottom of the sides to act as feet. Plane these pieces smooth.

Step No. 2—The Partitions. Between each two drawers there should be a partition of some kind. This can either be made of a solid piece, or as a frame, with a panel inserted. It will depend upon how skilled you are at wood work as to which you will want to do. These pieces separating the upper and lower drawer are first of all put in for constructive reasons; they prevent clothing from being pushed from one drawer to another, also act as drawer runners and keep out the dust. They are often called dust pans.

Step No. 3—Sandpapering. Thoroughly sandpaper all parts. Start with No. 1 sandpaper, then No. ½ and No. 0 sandpaper. Rub with the grain and use a scrap block to fold the sandpaper on as this insures flat surfaces, free from waves. Slightly round all corners.

Step No. 4—Assembling. The simplest way of putting this job together is to nail the sides on to the partitions, being careful to square up each one as you go along; then nail the top and back in place. If, however, you were skilful enough, a better method is to make dado joints and glue the piece together.

Step No. 5—The Drawers. The beginner need not become worried at not being either equipped with the proper tools or capable of constructing these drawers (although they are just the ordinary type,) for he can make each drawer as he would nail together a box, giving enough play room on the sides to allow free sliding. However, if you are a lucky boy and own a rabbet, plane, or plough, it will be a very interesting job for you to groove out the sides and front of the drawers as shown on the drawing, so as to make a real drawer.

Step No. 6—Miscellaneous. Cut out the two curved brackets at the bottom, and fasten these in place. Fit the drawer pulls on; these you can buy at a local store. Now remove this hardware while you are doing the finishing.

Step No. 7—Cleaning Up. Remove all excess glue with a sharp chisel; then thoroughly sandpaper all parts with No. ½, No. 0 and No. 00 sandpaper, rubbing with the grain.

Step No. 8—Finishing. If you have used knotty pine, apply one coat of boiled linseed oil, one coat of one to five solution of oil walnut stain and turpentine, two coats of shellac and wax.

Los Angeles Times SUNDAY MAGAZINE

As he listened to Aurore, watching her pretty lips move, meeting her brown eyes, Dorn marveled at the briefness of her account.

By William Byron Mowrey

THE SILVER HAWK

A Rich and Lovely Girl Steps Off a Transcontinental Train Into the Canadian Wilds and Into the Life of an Aviator; a Novel in Two Installments

THAT momentous night, before his partner returned with a story that was the thunder-whisper of a storm to come, James Dorn, aerial map-maker, had been musing in his "Calgary" tent, a dead pipe between his teeth; his quiet stern face a little less melancholy than was usual with him.

Assigned to the wildest and rockiest territory in the Northern Canadian Rockies, Dorn was glad to be living again in his native mountains after six years of absence, and glad that through all the spring and summer he would be flying over those magnificent ranges, charting with panorama camera the wilderness rivers, and lakes and virgin forests reaching north to the Yukon.

As he sat that night in his tent, in his lonely camp pitched under the spruces of Titan Island, an unconscious refrain was running in the background of his reverie: "It is good, good to be home again." A lonesome wolf howl quavering down from some naked pinnacle above timber line, the sleepy call of a great northern diver out on the lake, the song and laughter of the half-breed dance over at Titan Pass Station—those and a hundred others were sounds that Dorn understood and loved; and just by hearing them he felt solid and rooted in once more after long absence.

A home, in the sense of a human habitation or settled abode, Dorn had not known since his babyhood days down in the Blackfoot Selkirks; he had spent his orphaned years in various mining camps and timber crews and on the solitary fur path, so that home to him meant nothing more definite than this huge mountain wilderness stretching north from the Canadian National Railway. But in it he had grown to manhood, it had moulded him, it had taught him its lessons, it was inescapably a part of his being.

Sitting there motionless by his work table, with the electric torch lighting up his dark wavy hair and dark eyes and body as lean and efficient as a wolf's, Dorn was thinking back upon that April, six years ago, when he slammed his last fur pack on a trading counter and went south to the States and took up air work. He had thought never to return.

But during those years of airy adventuring—in the States, in Mexico, abroad with the Regiments Etrangers in sun-blistered Syria—he had been insensibly drawn back, to Canada. It was his birthplace, the seat of precious babyhood memories; and the thunder of its mighty name was a toosin in his blood. So that at twenty-eight, with an education and experience and a profession, Dorn had returned to that wilderness like a homing eagle. Titan Station, here, was his haven.

Since his coming three weeks ago in the first flush of April, he had charted a block of wilderness which a whole platoon of surveyors could not have covered so thoroughly in three years. The work was a daily adventure but he liked the gauntlet of dangers that he ran with every flight. For all Dorn's sober cast of mind, he leaped to a good battle.

Waiting for his partner to return, all unaware of the strange story Eby was to bring, Dorn listened to the sounds of the half-breed "sociable." As he heard the laughter of girls and the "music" coming across the moonlit waters of Lake Titan, the eternal unhappiness in Dorn's eyes faded a little and a rare smile crept over his face. He could fairly see old Pere Bergelot, the station master, sawing away on a raw pine fiddle, and old Luke Illewahwaset beating a beargut tomtom; and hear the shuffle of moccasin and thump of shoepac on the rough planks of the station platform.

Over there, too, was "Kansas" Eby, for whom he was waiting. For six years the

CARE OF THE BODY

There are other "jags" than purely those of John Barleycorn. The coffee hound who must have his three cups of coffee per day is, in my opinion, doing himself far more harm than the Frenchman who takes his glass of sherry the same number of times.

The soda-fountain cowboy who spends 50 cents to $1 daily on soft drinks and to whom water is comparatively unknown is doing himself a greater injury than the German with his Pilsener beer.

Socially speaking the solution to the problem is not the nullification of our prohibition law but rather the extension of the prohibition principle to include all drinks of every kind and description—alcoholic and otherwise—which are found, after a free and impartial investigation, to be injurious to human welfare.

In a general sense, our Pure-Foods-and-Drugs Act, theoretically at least, is supposed to protect us against injurious adulterants, preservatives and chemicals.

Why not extend the same principle to include all substances that are used for the destruction of the health of mankind?

Spastic Colon and Oil Enemas

For temporary use, particularly in cases of extreme spasticity and constipation, an oil enema is much more effective than the ordinary water enema.

Of course, "Care of the Body" does not recommend the continued use of any kind of enema but there is no doubt but that it has a temporary value.

For furnishing relief from spasticity and where there is considerable pain and rectal irritation the oil enema soothes, relaxes, softens the fecal substance and makes bowel activity a good deal easier.

In some cases we have a condition where the rectal sphincter muscle is exceedingly tight. It is almost impossible to insert the little finger. An oil enema given with an infant syringe at this time will do much toward relaxing such a tightened sphincter.

For ordinary use, nearly any vegetable oil is satisfactory—corn oil, cottonseed oil or olive oil. Olive oil is, in my opinion, the very best, even though it is a trifle more expensive.

The knee-chest position is probably the best method of administering an enema if self-given. If it is administered to a patient, the body should be tilted so that the feet are eight to ten inches higher than the head.

If such an enema be given, it is recommended that it be retained for from five to fifteen minutes so as to give the oil an opportunity to soak thoroughly into the bowel contents. Then the movement itself will be comparatively painless, hemorrhoids will not be irritated and rectal ulcers will not bleed.

Periods of Gestation

The British Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology recently published an interesting article by Dr. W. A. Jolly. He claims that there is a direct relationship between a mother's menstrual cycle and the duration of pregnancy.

In obstetrical work we know that there are marked variations in the duration of pregnancies. Some cases go for as long as ten months—others, seven months. It is very seldom that we can prove the exact 280 days' duration of pregnancy.

It is Dr. Jolly's claim that in the cases where a woman has a short mentrual cycle, that is, if menstruation occurs, say, every twenty-four days, the duration of pregnancy will occur as ten and one-half times the menstrual cycle. He assumes that ovulation and conception occur midway between both periods and that the period of pregnancy is in reality eleven times from the date of last menstruation or ten and one-half times from the period of conception.

It is an entirely new yet interesting observation.

It would be interesting to gather some facts on the matter and I should like to hear from any who can verify this assumption—that is, women who have had shorter durations of pregnancy and at the same time have also had shorter periods from one menstruation to the next.

Incidentally, I also want to report some interesting observations on the matter of sex determination—a group of figures which were gathered by the supervising maternity nurse at one of our leading hospitals. She made the observation that where the woman's age and month of birth were even, the child was a girl while if the age and month of birth were uneven, the child was a boy.

If, for instance, the woman's age were twenty-five and the child were born in an odd month, it would be a boy while if her age were twenty-six and the child born in an even month, it would be a girl.

I am not presenting either one of the ideas with the statement that I believe in them nor am I presenting them as positive knowledge or scientific facts. They are merely observations which have been made by two individuals, and I ask if there are any "Care of the Body" followers who can verify them.

If many mothers having had, say, five, six or seven children, all respond to the same rule, then there may be some vestige of truth in the theory.

If I get enough response to publish figures on either of these, I shall do so in a later article.

They are interesting even though they are not on a sufficiently sound basis to be accepted for practice.

BUNIONS

We have invented a day and night appliance for bunions and overlapped toes, and we have every reason to believe it will correct nine cases out of ten.

The night splints are worn while sleeping and the muscles are relaxed, to stretch the contracted tendons that distort the toes and cause this hideous deformity.

The day reducing appliance shields the bunion, hides the deformity and holds the toes in proper alignment and the normal traction for the bones will be re-established and in a short time the bunion disappears completely and forever.

CARE OF THE BODY

the entire body in the bath—just that portion from the waist down. Maintain a temperature a little above body heat and stay in from five to eight minutes.

This alone will very frequently remove the congestion which is invariably present at the time of chill.

As far as other treatment is concerned, a great deal depends upon the symptoms which develop.

If the throat becomes sore and the voice hoarse, cold compresses around the neck will be valuable. Massage of the neck muscles will also help.

But in all of the conditions stated above, don't eat anything. Nature wants you to eliminate the toxic poisons from the system and the chill and the alternate fever are one method of doing so. Therefore, assist nature in its purpose.

If you will follow these rules and take no medicine of any kind, particularly aspirin, cough medicines and drugs which stop the elimination of mucus which is inside the throat and chest, you will usually avoid the complications which often follow a chill—namely, influenza, pneumonia, bronchitis and asthma.

Fruits and a Clear Skin

HAWTHORNE, CAL.

Dear Dr. Lovell:

I am a mother twenty-six years old. I have had pimples and blackheads on my face, neck, arms and shoulders since I was fourteen years old. I have tried all kinds of medicines and treatment but none seems to do me any good.

I went on a diet of grapefruit and orange juice for five days. My skin cleared up better than it had for twelve years.

I also have a very oily skin.

My work is very hard and I cannot continue my diet.

If you can give me a diet to follow, I surely would appreciate it.

A READER.

This letter indicates a vital principle for which Care of the Body has fought for many years—that the condition of the skin is a reflection of the condition of the body. The condition of the body is an offshoot of our diet.

Here is a case in point.

She has tried every conceivable type of treatment—undoubtedly all of the popularly advertised lotions, ointments, salves and what-not. She has kept putting on, putting on and putting on, but to no avail—a typically futile process.

She should have understood many, many years ago that it was not what she put on or what she put in, but rather what came out which was of greater importance.

In this case it is not so much the magic power of her grapefruit and orange-juice diet. They are good foods, but they are not miracle makers. The main thing of value in her five-day grapefruit and orange-juice diet was the fast. She stopped putting in poisons—in fact, food of any nature except juices. Nature did the rest.

The eliminative organs, for the first time in many years, had an opportunity to catch up. They did, and her skin was better.

What is to be recommended in her case is not necessarily a grapefruit or orange-juice diet to be continued until she gets well, but rather a periodic resort to the remedy in conjunction with other measures.

She should know that the food she eats should be practically nothing more than fruits and vegetables, nuts, whole grain breadstuffs and a limited supply of the dairy products. That is all. She should eliminate all the sweets and concentrated starches, particularly.

Light Wines and Grape Juice

San Diego, Cal.

Dear Dr. Lovell:

In a recent article in The Times you stated that the ruddy health of the Europeans was due to the use of light wines, grape juice fermented.

May I ask that you inform me as to the correct situation.

A READER.

The writer of the above communication has either misconstrued my opinion or misquoted my article.

I have never stated that the ruddy health of the Europeans was due to the use of light wines. It would be as foolish to say that the vigor of the European peasant is due to light wines as it would be to say that our mechanical and commercial superiority is due to the fact that every family in this country has an automobile.

There are a large number of elements which go into the composition of good health. Our habit of attributing good health to one or two things we do or one or two things we fail to do is just as silly as our constant search for a cure-all.

Good health is produced only by a rounded method of living. The individual's diet, personal hygiene, method of thinking, sex usage, occupation, financial status, personal and sociological conditions, together with the habits and customs of a people, play a very prominent part.

It is only that the consumption of light wines and beers is one of the habits that I discussed them. I merely wanted to contrast the enormous consumption of soft drinks in this country, with their high concentration of sugar, with what I believe to be the better habits of many of the European peoples.

Beginning and the End of the World

The way it was we were present at the funeral of an old friend for whom a star had beckoned low. And at the funeral, carried in its mother's arms, was a little child. We could not help but think that as we stood there we were a witness of the beginning and the end of the world.

There has always been a great wonder in the minds of men when it was that the the world began. Scientists have for centuries tried in vain to find the answer, and are trying still with little or no more success than their predecessors had before them. Now and then the bones and skull of a prehistoric man are dug out of a lime quarry with the result that the scientists think they have found at last the answer to the question as to when man first appeared on the earth. But the answer is not yet. The only thing that seems to become clearer all the time is that man began as man and is not at all an offspring of apes or monkeys.

Then there are those who are constantly predicting the end of the world, often fixing exact dates when that tremendous event will occur. But they have all, so far, missed their guesses. It does not seem that anyone will ever know when the world will come to an end until it does come to an end. Maybe it will never come to an end. Who knows?

Yet, this dead man whose funeral we attended, and the child who was there were both, as far as each was concerned, at the beginning and the end of the world.

The little child looking out in utter vagueness upon what was around it and upon the people assembled was at the beginning of its world. All that is in the world is waiting for that child. Its eyes are to see the world's wonders as newly as though they had been created just that morning. The Pillars of Hercules await that child, the Azores, the isles of the sea, the snows of the Arctic, Spain, and all the roads that ever were await that child's footsteps.

For the man who was dead, the end of the world had come for him. No matter when it may end for us who now live or for those who shall live after us, it ended for the man who died. His steps will not again echo in familiar places, his voice will no more be heard, his closed eyes will see nothing from the grave wherein they laid him.

And so it is that the beginning and the end of the world comes to us all.

A Old Oxcart Turned to Stone

A Santa Barbara man who sits under a rafter of the Synagogue up there in that lovely clasp of the Santa Ynez Hills had a letter for us the other day in the big mail sack which we drag up the fragrant trails of the chaparral to our little high house in the hills.

In the letter the man said that he has "a natural American curiosity complex," and that he determined to run down a story he had heard about a petrified oxcart.

And so what did he do but trudge up the Santa Paula Canyon from the Ojai Valley to satisfy himself as to the truth of the saying attributed to David that "all men are liars."

Well, to make a long story short, danged if he didn't find the petrified oxcart, much to his surprise and amazement. And now we quote from the letter:

"On the eastern slope of one of the pinnacles, far beneath the ranger station, it lies immovable as history itself—an old Spanish oxcart of pre-secularization times, literally petrified from tongue to gate. It is of the four-wheel type with stakes of oak and manzanita. In other words, it is just an old oxcart, ordinary in every respect and characteristic of its type, except for its petrification.

"The cart was half overturned, half buried at the side of a road. And what a road it must have been, but now grown over with manzanita and mountain laurel. We tried to trace it, but our reward was little; landslides, erosion, and the actual efforts of the Spanish themselves had done much to obliterate it.

"We figured that it would be best to climb the tallest peaks and try to find remnants with our glasses, but time has almost effaced the road. Some say there is a relic of an old chapel in the Ojai Valley, and the road was supposed to have led to it, but others say it led to an old silver mine. And this seems more plausible, because I found ore all along the fire-break and on that section of the road. My theory depicts it a victim of the secularization era; and to elude the irrascible Mexicans, they hid all evidence of occupation."

Well, sir, this is a fascinating story. And the writer of the letter wants to know if the Conductor of this poor blundering page can link the story with some known fact.

We must answer and say that we cannot link the story with any particular fact, linking it only with the old glamorous, happy past of California when there were silver mines to be worked, gold to be washed out of the canyons, and oxcarts to travel in instead of automobiles and airplanes.

Yet this is very mysterious—this thing of the ox cart being petrified. To be sure there are other places in California where there is much evidence of petrification, but we never heard of it before in the Ojai Valley which is a place for dreams and memories of the great past.

No doubt there are chemists and archeologists and historians sitting in the Synagogue this blessed Sabbath morning who can shed much light on the mystery.

Our Best Compliments to Mary Martin

A statement published in newspapers concerning negroes has been shown to us and has interested us greatly.

From the statement referred to we learn that Mrs. Mary Brown Martin, a negro woman who is the daughter of parents who were born, reared and married in slavery, has been elected to be a member of the Board of Education of the city of Cleveland, Ohio. She is the first woman of her race to be so honored in the United States.

Our compliments to Mrs. Martin. She is an honor to her people and to a great race which has made during the past sixty years the most amazing progress yet made in the same length of time by any race on the face of the earth.

We trust that her term of office on the Board of Education will prove pleasant to her and profitable to the people of the city where she lives. We trust that she will be respected because respect is due her and that her fellow members of the board will not be afflicted with a snobbish superiority complex. She is just as good as any of them. The only difference between Mrs. Martin and some other American women is that her skin is dark and theirs is light. It is merely a matter of the color of the skin, and nothing more.

We learn also that a much larger portion of public school funds is being allocated now than was formerly for the support of negro education.

Nothing is more eloquent to our mind than the fact that negroes have taken full advantage of every opportunity ever offered to them in the way of education. And many of the race, both men and women, have traveled far. The negro race has given us, and still gives to us, not only great citizens, able business men, professional men and women, but, better than all that, poets, artists and dreamers of beautiful dreams.

It is an inspiring picture. We rejoice with our brothers and sisters whose souls and hearts have in them the ancient rhythm of Africa's olden glory.

She Sailed the Seven Seas When Young

It was the night before Christmas in the Mission Inn at Riverside. And that was a good place to be the night before Christmas or any other night or day. It is a hotel, but unlike all the hotels of the world. It is more like the stateliest of the old Franciscan missions used to be. There is a sense of peace and rest in it.

Well, people were gathered there that night from all parts of the world, and we were happily among them. In the great music room a Nativity play was given and it was our good fortune to sit beside a woman of New England.

We fell into talk with her almost without an introduction. It seems that even Yankees when they come to California and are in a house like the Mission Inn forget their hereditary reserve. They thaw out and become very human.

Anyway, she was a lovely lady and she told us a lot about Cape Cod where she was born and reared. She is the daughter of one of the old-time skippers whose ships sailed the Seven Seas in the trade with China and India and what was then the remote parts of the world.

Her father almost always took her with him on his voyages. And so when she was not much more than a child and through the years of her young maidenhood she sailed the Seven Seas in one of the old clippers that could run before the wind as fast as any steamboat. She was at the Azores and the Pillars of Hercules. She rounded the Horn and set foot on India's coral strand. She hobnobbed with the orientals everywhere, sailed the ancient sea pathways of the Phoenicians and sighted the golden coast of our California on the voyage of return.

The lady told us that now that those days are past and she and her husband have slipped back into private life she once or twice made luxurious voyages in ocean liners to the old far away scenes that were so familiar to her in her childhood and youth. But, she said, they never seemed the same to her after she had grown up.

And that's just it.

"When Youth the dream departs,
It takes something from our hearts,
And it never comes again."

The Little Things

I thank Thee, Lord, that I can still be grateful for the little things—
The blade of grass I found this morning, born
since last sun-down;
The tiny humming bird who sips his life from my small garden plot;
The mocking bird who sits a-top my tallest tree with outspread wings and bathes in falling rain drops, while he sings and sings.

The slender eucalyptus tracing with long slim fingers a love song across the sky;
The gentle, soothing touch of moonbeams through the ether reaching down to lay a healing kiss upon my brow;
A word of sweet appreciation now and then, from those we love;
The unexpected little things from kindly thought of friend who offers us his blossoms here and now.

The confidence and trusting smile that little children to us give along life's thoroughfare;
The thrilling thought that comes with each new day—perhaps, perhaps a better song will come—than yesterday.
He who asks for gold or fame or bigger things than these may have his prayer;
I only ask, dear God, just let me live and have the little things.

Gratifying Scarcity of Harmful Bacteria in Atmosphere Over Southern California Shown Through Tests Made by Pony Blimp—First Printing of Culture Photos—California Invents Meter for Determining Brightness of Light—Decomposition of Uranium Is Accurate Measure of Earth's Age

Capturing Bacteria in the Air

As a contribution to the campaign conducted by The Times, Chamber of Commerce and other organizations for the location of the proposed lighter-than-air naval base at Camp Kearney, San Diego, the Goodyear blimp, Volunteer, made a thorough scientific investigation of atmospheric conditions over Southern California in altitudes between twenty-five hundred and forty-five hundred feet. It was largely a hunt for the kinds of bacteria that exist in the air and afflict aviators. Lieut. Karl Lange and Bud Campbell were in charge of the blimp, and the results of the investigation, as reported by the Chamber of Commerce, are here printed photographically for the first time.

The cultures were obtained, at different altitudes, by passing measured quantities of air through specially prepared dishes of warm, nutritive, sterilized jells. Every invisible single organism in the air thus became imbedded in the jelly and in due time multiplied into a colony large enough to be seen and photographed. By counting the colonies in the pictures, therefore, it can be determined exactly how many individual germs the samples of air contained.

Perhaps it should be stated that full-grown bacteria seldom float around for any length of time in air. The spores, or "seeds" of the germs, are the floaters. Long-lived and hardy against heat and cold, they may be carried by clouds, or currents of air, from one county to another, and if they happen to be pathogenic, or disease-breeding varieties, they are likely to start epidemics wherever they are washed down to earth by rains or are precipitated by other means. In this way germ diseases may jump from one locality to another one, despite embargoes and quarantines.

But there is one thing which neither spores nor germs of any kind can long withstand, and that is ultra-violet light. Clouds, smoke, persistent fogs, humidity and floating dust are lifesavers to bacteria, because they screen out the rays of short wave-lengths. Dazzling white sunshine, being rich in ultra-violet light, is man's best friend and bacteria's most deadly enemy.

Shortly before Lange's investigation started, an airplane hunt for bacteria was undertaken by an organization affiliated with Cambridge University, England. According to reports, "the tests showed a large number of bacteria and fungus spores vigorously alive as far as two miles above the earth, and they were especially numerous in clouds."

In striking contrast to the Cambridge report and similar reports from various sections of our own country, Lieut. Lange's photographs show that the atmosphere overlying Southern California is remarkably immune to pathogenic spores.

Sample No. 1, obtained at an altitude of only twenty-five hundred feet, contained five spores, which multiplied into colonies and merged into the insect-shaped mass that clouds the picture. Two of the three circles may, according to bacteriologists, be smaller colonies. These bacteria, however, all belong to a nonpathogenic or harmless species.

Sample No. 2, taken at an altitude of forty-five hundred feet directly above Los Angeles, shows only two colonies: the large fungus-like growth, which is crossed by the black dish-clamp, and a smaller growth under the curve of the clamp. The marble-shaped objects are bubbles, or foreign substances, in the culture medium. In these tangles of bacteria, which look like tangled strings of beads under a microscope, there are no harmful individuals; they all belong to a well-known nonpathogenic species.

Sample No. 3, obtained at an altitude of twenty-five hundred feet over a country area, shows several colonies of nonpathogenic B subtilus and a few colonies of cocci which are probably pathogenic.

Many samples of air were obtained on different days and at higher and lower levels, but nothing more dangerous than the ordinary "hay bacillus" developed. Aside from the scientific aspect of this investigation, it is gratifying to learn that the regions along the coast of Southern California, wherein aviators work, contain breathing air as pure as could be found anywhere.

Quartz for Biological Light

It takes thirty-two hundred degrees of heat to melt quartz so it may be molded into window panes. On the roof of a sanatorium at Saranac Lake, however, a solarium has been constructed wholly of quartz panes, seven and one-half inches square and one-fourth-inch thick, which the General Electric Company fused. Within that sunroom, on a perfectly clear day, patients will receive nearly as much ultra-violet light as everybody receives in the open air, for quartz is penetrable by the biological ray.

Rheology

To study the "law of flow" is the purpose of a new scientific society. Some of its members are said to be trying to count the millions of molecules that can rest on a needle's point. Those who think such efforts silly should remember that not many years ago the savants were trying to determine how to send messages through the air without using wires.

Steadman's Actinometer

F. M. STEADMAN writes in from Atascadero that he has invented a simple device for measuring the photographic brightness, or actinicity, of any subject with approximate accuracy. "Variations between different localities throughout a normal day," he says, "as well as variations due to weather, are indicated in terms of brightness, or actinos."

The sun's face, for example, at about thirty degrees above the horizon, registers sixty-four million actinos, whereas a white house in full sunlight registers only ten hundred and twenty-four actinos. According to the height of the sun, people register two hundred and fifty-six, one hundred and twenty-eight, sixty-four, thirty-two, sixteen and eight actinos—the jump being downward in halves or upward in doubles, it seems.

The instrument, two inches long and half an inch thick, is held in the palm of one's hand. If this actinometer does all that the inventor claims, it should be especially important in motion-picture photography.

Science News

At the recent meeting of the American Optical Society, the Einstein theory was vigorously attacked by four members and defended by one. Despite the attack, however, the theory still stands.

Dr. Dayton C. Miller, who last year won the annual prize of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, has repeated his ether-drift experiments and confirmed his earlier findings of a six-mile-per-second drift. Most of Dr. Miller's work was done on Mt. Wilson, where Dr. Michelson's similar experiments revealed no drift.

Using a regular radio transmission station, the German Lufthansa organization is said to be flashing weather charts and photographs to pilots in airplanes.

According to Prof. W. H. Twenhofel of the University of Wisconsin, sea water contains fifteen hundred tons of solid matter in every cubic mile, or a total of about three hundred and forty-five billion tons. And every year, he says, about twenty tons of additional mineral matter is being deposited on every square mile of ocean bottom.

Under deep layers of Arctic ice, on St. Lawrence Island in Behring Strait, have been discovered relics of a prehistoric settlement, such as harpoons, charms and primitive tools, and it is thought this settlement was founded before the land-bridge between Siberia and Alaska broke down.

Science News Appeal Growing

KARL A. BICKEL, president of a press association which deals in news and who knows the news value of different subjects as expertly as the farmer knows the value of farm products, has this to say about science: "In 1903 Wilbur Wright made his first airplane flight. It was a small news story, and short-lived. The difference then and now! We see science in the front-page prominence of news about airplanes, motor cars, radio, atoms, radium, X-ray, ultra-violet light, synthetic chemistry, power transmission, and so on."

When Einstein first announced his theory of relativity, Mr. Bickel says his company sent out only one hundred words about it, and only one newspaper used the whole dispatch. Last year, however, when Einstein elaborated his theory, press associations sent out thousands of words, and every important newspaper in the United States gave the announcement front-page prominence. At the breakfast table, where morning papers are read, science seems to be edging toward the head of the table as ambitiously as some society people in Washington.

Mother Earth's Age

Halley, of comet fame, tried to find out earth's age by calculating the time it took the rains and rivers to wash the salts from the lands into the oceans. Geologists likewise calculated the time it took for rivers to deposit their deltas, for the Niagara to gouge out its gorge, and for the geological strata to be laid down. But all such methods were defective. Like hour-glasses, neither the rivers nor the sands ran uniformly.

In uranium physicists have at last found a reliable self-recording clock. Disintegrating, it gives off gases and the final residue is lead, the rate of disintegration being definitely known. After three billion years an ounce of uranium would not weight an ounce; nearly one-third of the ounce would be represented by lead. As uranium is always found associated with .306 per cent of its own weight in lead, it is easy to calculate that some three billion years have elapsed since the first lead was formed. Putting all facts learned from radio-activity together, it seems that Mother Earth ceased to be a shining star and paled into a planet about three billion, four hundred million years ago.

decay under the presumption that new teeth will take their place. Many mothers reason that inasmuch as the child's first teeth must come out, it is a useless expenditure to have them taken care of.

I want to correct this great fallacy. The first teeth act as a foundation for the second. The quality of the first set will invariably indicate the quality of the second.

If you cannot afford the expense of having your child's teeth taken care of, I am sure there are plenty of school clinics in your immediate vicinity where the child's teeth will be given the proper attention practically at cost or at no cost at all.

The main thing to remember is that the child's first set of teeth are just as valuable as his second set.

Consequently, pay rigid regard to the first set and you will not regret it for the second.

At this time it is also advisable to inculcate into the habits of the child those routine things to do by means of which he will ultimately have good teeth.

He should learn how to use the toothbrush after each meal. He should learn to scrub the teeth thoroughly. He should learn to eat hard foods so that the teeth get some vigorous work to do and the gums are massaged.

The time to start such habits is when the child is one, two, three and four years of age.

Abnormalities of the Thyroid Gland

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Dear Dr. Lovell:

Will you please advise me as to what is the best method of overcoming an enlarged thyroid gland?

Thank you for a reply.

A READER.

This is a disease sometimes called goiter. More and more the healing arts are beginning to recognize that the presence of goiter is essentially a nutritional problem.

Goiter is co-existent where the water is loaded with excesive and wrong types of minerals and where the foodstuffs we consume have been changed from their original status so that they are robbed of the precious vitamines and mineral salts.

We know this to be true by the application of the reverse principles of diet. We know that when we give a patient suffering from goiter a plentiful supply of fresh, unchanged, wholesome fruits and vegetables, the goiter will be markedly diminished and ultimately will disappear.

There seems to be a current idea that iodine, or rather the lack of iodine, is the responsible chemical substance for the presence of goiter.

Although there may be some glat of truth in it, iodine is not the only mineral absent in the average enlarged thyroid. We can truthfully say that there is a general demineralization. When I say a "general demineralization," I do not refer to the inorganic or dead earthy minerals which we find, for instance, in water and salts of the earth, but rather to the organic, live mineral constituents which we find in growing plant food.

It is, therefore, my firm belief that the correction of the diet from the current meat-soup-coffee-and-pie diet to that advocated by this department will accomplish excellent results in the case of an enlarged thyroid gland.

Chill

I have frequently been asked as to treatment in event of chill.

This is especially pertinent at this time of the year.

Many hundreds of people are poorly prepared to meet climatic conditions such as rain and snow. Their feet get wet, their stockings soaked, and before they know it they begin to have the symptoms of chill and fever.

These are the early premonitory symptoms sometimes found in an acute attack of influenza. Sometimes they mean nothing at all. That is, chill and later on, fever, may come with a disease which may carry one down for several weeks. On the other hand, they may be merely the early symptoms of a mild cold.

There are a number of things which should be done and a number of things which should not be done when you do suffer a chill, and it is this advice which I desire to give you.

As soon as the first symptoms occur, go to bed and try to warm up. That is essential.

Next, don't try to eat anything. The less you put into the digestive system, the better you will be.

If you feel well enough, go to the bathroom and take an enema and follow that by a warm bath. Be sure that the room is not chilly. Also be sure that the bedroom is warm.

It is not that you need be afraid of fresh air, but rather that you do not want to contact it until you have been sufficiently warmed up.

Consequently, get warm following the bath as well.

It is most advisable not to immerse toxic food and the onset of initial symptoms.

"The food vomited is naturally accused. This mistake was made in the Detroit outbreak, where corn was suspected because it was found in the vomitus, whereas the trouble really came from ripe olives eaten the day before.

"Most cases of botulism are caused by food that has received some preservative treatment such as smoking, canning or pickling, and not in fresh food. Home-packed foods have been especially responsible, for the reason that they are often a day or more old when put up. The temperature of processing is frequently not sufficient to kill the botulinus spores. All the olive cases were due to ripe olives put up in glass and improperly processed.

"Sausages are a frequent source of botulism in Germany. The sausages readily become infected and present ideal anaerobic condition for the growth of the organism, especially as they are rarely refrigerated and frequently contain old and contaminated scraps of meat. The disease is, therefore, frequently called sausage poisoning. Certain sausages, such as the blood sausage and the liver sausage prepared in Wurttemberg and Baden, are especially apt to be infected. Venison and roasts have also produced the intoxication.

"No reliance can be placed upon odor, taste, or appearance to detect the toxin in food. It is true that in many instances a history is obtained that the responsible food looked spoiled, tasted wrong or smelled tainted. Experts can detect the peculiar butyric acid smell of culture of botulinus.

"A safe rule is not to eat food that is soft, mushy and shows gas, with a spoiled or putrefactive odor. Canned food that shows gas formation or other evidence of spoilage should not be eaten, especially if home-processed.

"A very small amount of the toxin-containing food is sufficient to cause symptoms and death. Merely tasting the contents or just 'nibbling' the food has been fatal."

Nosebleed

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Dear Dr. Lovell:

I shall appreciate any advice you can give me with reference to nosebleed.

A READER.

In the ordinary case of nosebleed, where there is a slight discharge of blood, I would say, "Forget it." We can afford to lose three or four ounces without any harm to the system. However, where the condition is regular and persistent, something is wrong with the body and we should ascertain the why and the wherefore of the trouble.

Find out from which nostril the blood is coming. Thrust the patient head backward and permit some of the blood to accumulate inside the nostril itself. The presence of a considerable quantity of blood will help in forming a clot.

If this is unsuccessful, then pinch the patient's nose. It will very often stop the bleeding.

If this is of no avail, the next best thing to do is to apply very cold packs—that is, ice water or ice itself directly on the nose and a cold pack on the neck.

If this measure fails, the best thing to do is to pack the nose with sterile cotton. Invariably it will be sufficient to stop any severe nosebleed.

Decaying Teeth in Children

A mother recently asked whether she should have the decayed teeth of her little one taken care of or whether she should permit the decay to go on in view of the fact that the child would later on get a new set of teeth.

This is a very important question, especially for many thousands of mothers who perhaps cannot afford large dental bills.

Their reason is that since the child will get another and more permanent set of teeth, it is all right to let the baby teeth go and that when nature puts in the new teeth, the new ones will be given the proper care and attention.

The economic phase undoubtedly plays an important part in many cases of children whose teeth are allowed to

LANDMARKS of YESTERYEAR

By Mary Timpe Smith

IN 1852 the State of California produced eighty-one million, two hundred and ninety-four thousand, seven hundred dollars in gold, most of which came from the vicinity of Columbia, in Tuolumne county.

Columbia, whose rise and fall reads like a romance—today only another "ghost city," yet in the 'fifties she bade fair to become the capital of the Golden State, losing her opportunity by only two votes. Rumor tells that had not two of her lusty miners been drunk, and so unable to cast their votes upon that occasion, Columbia today might not be a forgotten, deserted mining camp, found only by those who enjoy prowling in out-of-the-way places.

Driving through the main street, it is easy in imagination to repopulate the deserted town with the thirty thousand people who once bustled about her streets, bound in one common pursuit—gold. Desolate streets that today are flanked on either side chiefly by sagging shacks, with here and there a substantial two-story building of brick. Long-empty saloons still stand, and on every building of importance, the impenetrable doors of iron remind us that gold once abounded here in such quantities that its protection from robbers was Columbia's gravest concern.

John Shine, one of Columbia's pioneers, says that his father has often told him of Columbia in 1850, when thousands of men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five made up her picturesque, eager population, men from every walk of life. Mr. Shine is now in his eighties, hale and hearty, and will gladly reminisce of the early days.

The Wells Fargo sign still hangs over the one-time stage and express office. On the same building Tom Conlin's "Gold Dust Exchange" sign reminds us that more virgin gold passed over the counters in the 'fifties than minted coins. Tom Conlin, aged and feeble, as much a part of Columbia as her memories, sits watchful in the sunshine, recalling perhaps her glorious past.

The Pioneer Saloon, its roof sagging, but brick walls in good condition, with heavy iron doors on both street and basement entrances, is now the background for a Bret Harte Trail sign, which tells of the early population and renown of Columbia. Here in the 'sixties Mark Twain mingled with the miners, seeking material for his stories as well as gold.

The old fire engines, antique in design, stand in the firehouse, covered with dust and cobwebs.

Columbia's landscape today, as far as the eye can see, resembles a vast dry river bed of clean, shining white boulders, long since picked and washed clean of the gold that abounded there. St. Anne's Church, built in 1851, stands a sentinel among the waste of rocks, on a rolling hillside slightly higher than the surrounding ground, with her decaying churchyard and falling gravestones. Some, the more devout, prefer to believe that never has the soil under the churchyard been desecrated by the lustful search for gold, and the surface at least remains intact, but others have it that an English company tunneled under this sacred soil many years ago, unmindful of those who rest there. Be that as it may, the graves for some time past have been gradually sinking, until deep depressions mark their outlines.

St. Anne's was restored by the Knights of Columbus and Native Sons and Daughters, and is now used as an occasional place of worship. The old murals painted directly on the kalsomined walls above the altar are still in good preservation, and are said to have been painted by two young artists who later turned prospector and miner.

Columbia's marble quarry, which has been operating since 1857, is the only one in continuous operation in California. Its marble is shipped everywhere, and has been used for many of the sidewalks in the near-by cities of Tuolumne county.

Pocket mining, which is still the attraction in Tuolumne county and continues to bring mining men there today, was peculiar to the southern mines. Jackass Hill, the home of Mark Twain, where his cabin still stands five miles from Columbia, produced a number of these pocket mines. The returns were quick and sure, making the lucky pocket miners rich over night.

Stage Drivers' Retreat.

By 1853 hydraulic mining was taking the place of the placers, which were about worked out. The country in and around Columbia bears the marks of the excavating and washing the soil for gold, leaving exposed the vast expanse of white rocks which stand today, mute, gutted remains of what John Shine says was once a beautiful oak flat.

There are two conflicting stories of the rich discovery in 1850, the first giving credit to a party of Mexicans, but the accepted version of the finding of gold is that Dr. Thaddeus Hildreth and a party of men made camp one night under an oak tree at a spot which is now the main street, and being caught in a heavy rain, perforce remained to dry their bedding. One of the men prospected the ground in a gulch near-by, found the results encouraging, and they decided to remain and prospect more thoroughly. They found an ounce of gold and located that ground. Columbia was originally called "Hildreth's Diggings," after Dr. Hildreth.

Their greatest drawback was lack of water, which later proved a serious hindrance to Columbia's progress, as the miners had to carry their pay dirt to near-by streams to wash it.

A typical story of those who came to find gold and remained to spend it, is that of young Caldwell, a lad of twenty-one, who in 1850 had a claim along the river channel near Columbia. Washing his dirt in a sluice box, he would scoop up in handfuls the nuggets which covered the riffles. These he carried to town in a buckskin bag or "poke," remaining until the last ounce was spent, then returning to his claim to sluice for more gold. Thirty saloons and over one hundred gambling houses in Columbia gave the miners plenty of opportunity to spend their quick riches.

Caldwell's claim is said to have yielded two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

True to the earliest traditions of the West, the first tent put up on the present site of Columbia was used as a drinking and gambling saloon.

Gold scales were unknown, and a teaspoonful was called an ounce, a wineglassful one hundred dollars, and a tumblerful one thousand dollars. In 1852 the first gold scales were shipped into Columbia, being brought around the Horn.

Judge Crispin Ortega, a native son, born in Columbia in 1854, says that the news of the gold strike in this region spread and flashed meteor-like all over the world in 1850, in spite of the lack of means of communication, telegraph and modern speed. His father, then a young man, and his mother, a girl of fifteen, were both living in Valparaiso, South America, though unacquainted at that time. His father heard of the gold rush, and set sail for San Francisco in a schooner, the trip taking three or four months. His mother was brought here in a separate vessel by her wealthy foster-mother, and soon after their arrival in California, they met and were married. San Francisco was only a tent city then, and they did not linger there for long, but came straight to Columbia.

"When my mother was just a bride, they had a claim near where Mark Twain's cabin stands now," the judge related with his old-time Spanish charm. "She used to pan gold herself, and got seven or eight dollars a day. Sixteen dollars was considered a good day's panning."

Asked if they got rich at it, he replied: "No, and many others did not. The men in Columbia would move frequently from one claim to another, if they heard of a richer spot. But my parents stayed here in Tuolumne county, my mother giving birth to twenty children. I have lived here all my life," he added with pride, "and held public office for thirty years."

The Columbia diggings were rich beyond the miners' wildest dreams, but the first winter proved a bitter disappointment, owing to scanty rains. What the miners needed was water. The gold in the southern mines was produced from placer or surface diggings in canyons, gulches and stream beds, but it was too laborious and slow to carry their pay dirt to the streams to wash it, and many left, discouraged. About this time some of the more enterprising business men evolved a scheme for bringing water from near-by streams, and in the spring of 1852 a company called Tuolumne County Water Company was organized to turn a branch of the Stanislaus River into the tableland in the vicinity of Columbia, which plan was successful, and soon thereafter a branch of Five-Mile Creek was turned into Columbia, and later the Stanislaus River was diverted in the same manner.

Columbia from its beginning was flooded with foreigners, Mexicans, Chinese and others, and the Chinese Camp, a few miles away, had been founded in 1849.

About a year after Columbia's discovery, the Legislature passed a foreign miners tax which for a time practically depopulated the town. This tax provided that foreign miners must each pay twenty dollars per month while mining, and soon after this Columbia enacted even more stringent laws against the Chinese, barring Asiatics and South Sea Islanders from mining either for themselves or others, and any person who sold them a claim in the district could not own another claim for six months.

In 1851 women began to arrive in camp, and perhaps it was their softening, gentle influence which caused the gambling and drinking to diminish somewhat. It is told by early pioneers that all the miners quit work in order to go for miles down the road to meet the first woman who entered camp, playing

PHYSICIANS WORLD FAMOUS TEST
You Should Try on Yourself

The illustration, with the description in the accompanying article, will enable you to make and interpret Glenard's test, which has been used extensively by eminent physicians all over the world, and has given them the clue to the cause and remedy for body disturbances which had been baffling to other physicians who had not known how to use this test. You can make this test for yourself. It teaches much accurately as to causes of ill-health that will be a safe guide for you to follow. The simple, easily self applied measures are not only the cheapest but are generally the most effective. God helps those who help themselves. Study the principles set forth in the following article by Dr. Poole:

DR. PERCY POOLE

DR. GEORGEAN POOLE

PTOSLYFOLOGY

Stand and place the hands on the lower part of abdomen, just above the bones, keeping the muscles of the abdomen relaxed, then take a deep breath, at the same time pushing the hands inward and pulling upward, so as to lift the lower part of the intestines, exhale, still holding the intestines up; take another deep breath, exhale; then take another breath, then exhale, at the same time quickly remove the hands with the abdominal muscles relaxed. Note if there is a feeling of dragging down, take another deep breath and note if there is greater difficulty in expanding the ribs.

If the abdominal organs sag down, you have what is known technically as enteroptosis, dropping of the abdominal organs, if you are not in perfect health; you will be a rara avis if you do not show upon examination that your organs hang down in the abdomen, instead of being held up and supported by the strong ligaments in the lower front part of the abdominal wall. Nature thought such support so difficult and important that she placed the strongest ligaments in the human body at the lower front part of the abdomen. When these ligaments stretch sagging is inevitable. If the abdominal organs are not held up by the support of these ligaments, there is a sagging of those organs. It is nearly always noticeable in cases of low stomach and sagged intestines, that breathing is easier and deeper when the weight is taken from the ribs, as nature intended it should be, by the ligaments at bottom of abdomen. Make Glenard's test again and see if it makes any difference to your breathing.

The drag causes shallow breathing, which cannot be corrected by an effort at deep breathing exercises. This shallow breathing affects the health of the whole body in very many ways. One of the most serious being that the diaphragm muscle is not fully contracted when there is not a deep breath taken. This muscle has been described as the key muscle of the body, as much depends upon its movements as upon the beating of the heart. The heart only moves blood through the arteries; upon the action of the diaphragm depends the circulation of venous blood and all other fluids in the abdominal cavity. Shallow breathing means sluggish circulation of the liver and every other organ. The ill-effects of this condition of sagged organs are manifold and lead to serious diseases of many kinds, and this condition, it can be positively proven, is the one that more often than any other keeps a person struggling vainly to recover full health and vigor. It must be corrected.

Every branch of the healing art has recognized how common is this condition of sagged organs. It has been described by many medical writers as universal, all of the schools of the healing art have recognized the serious handicap this condition places upon the body functioning, and all schools have advanced theories and practiced methods for correcting it. From thought suggestion to surgical operations, William Mayo and others tried operating, but all surgeons at the top have gone on record as considering surgical operation inadvisable, as adhesions occur and the sagging of intestines recurs. Associated with the stretching of the ligaments is likely to be insufficient fat in the abdomen, the sagging hampering the absorption of fat. A person who is quite plump may have stretched ligaments in abdominal wall, yet not have sagged intestines to a degree which interferes seriously with functioning of digestive organs, or produce any of the many ill-effects from which a thin person, or a person who has lost weight suddenly will suffer.

Many exercise systems have been devised for toning up the muscles of the abdominal wall. These exercises, if not excessive, may help the general health, but even if the muscles are developed and educated to hold up the organs, such support can only be maintained for a few minutes. It is upon short ligaments, not strong muscles, that support must depend. If an athlete stretched the ligaments in his arm or wrist, he would not try to correct the stretching by exercise; he would give the ligaments a period of rest. Fortunately, rest can be given to the ligaments in the abdominal wall by holding them at normal length, while at the same time perfect freedom is allowed for muscle movements. By the combination of help to nature in holding the ligaments short, while the muscles are exercised to tone up the tissues of the abdominal wall, here we have the only means of permanent cure of this condition.

Massage, electrical application heat, etc., may be beneficial and may be advisable, to meet a special emergency, but such agencies cannot permanently cure the condition. Heat in such cases might be helpful in reducing inflammation, but it would be as foolish to rely solely on such aids to circulation as heat, electricity and massage in cases of sagged intestines as it would be in the case of a broken arm. Not to hold the ligaments in correct position continuously, for several months, is to leave the person goaded by body discomfort, to make the rounds of the doctors' offices. If every person in Los Angeles who would be benefited by a PROPERLY ADAPTED support, obtained a support CORRECTLY ADAPTED to meet their particular needs, there would be very many vacant rooms in hospitals.

Unfortunately, it is not an easy matter to apply a support so as to relieve the drag and strain and shorten the ligaments correctly. Elastic belts, ordinary store supports and surgical belts, cannot be relied upon to give the support required, such supports merely press back and cannot from their structure hold pouparts ligaments in a shorter position. A few years ago all the known knowledge of physiology and anatomical functioning, and the mechanical principles of the human body and the principles of support fitting was organized into a science known as ptoslyfology and a college was formed and conducted a vast number of experiments, Dr. Percy H. Poole and Dr. Georgean H. Poole each established over 4,000 hours of preparatory training in and study of ptoslyfology and passed the examination of the college with the highest honors. The fitting of a support to obtain the desired results requires a more comprehensive knowledge of anatomy than is required for dentistry or optometry, and requires as much practice and skill as is required for these arts.

It is thin people or those who have lost weight suddenly who suffer the most ill-effects from sagged intestines and low stomach—the two always go together. It is not mechanically possible for these people to obtain the needed relief from strain by the use of any elastic belt, no matter how constructed. Ordinary store belts or surgical corsets like elastic belts do not give the uplifting pull that a person applies when they make the Glenard test. This state of sagged down abdominal organs is practically always found in people in run-down health, being particularly severe in thin people. Merely to wear an ordinary abdominal supporter or surgical corset that does not give the uplift, as is obtained from the hands, does not give to nature the rest and relief so urgently required.

Dr. Charles Aaron, the leading stomach specialist of today, speaking of this condition, wrote: "Some substantial agency of relief is required. This, I believe, in common with many physicians and surgeons, can best be brought about by a properly fitted support. Surgeons, in fact, often recommend a support after the operation, but they credit the operation rather than the belt with the improvement that ensues. A properly fitted belt enables the viscera (digestive organs) to function normally, rehabilitating the organism."

Dr. J. B. Satterlee, writing in the American Medical Journal, dwelt upon the commonness of enteroptosis (low stomach, sagged intestines,) and stated: "We cannot very well get along without a properly adapted support in such cases."

If you are in ill-health there may be many things that are wrong and that are contributing to your ill-health, but the one that is most likely to be at the bottom of your difficulty in regaining a full measure of vigorous health is low stomach and sagged intestines.

Massage is of considerable value in helping circulation and in helping to move the bowels. Electricity may also be of benefit in stimulating circulation; heat and adjustments may help to remove some of the conditions that ARISE from enteroptosis, but these measures, though they may give relief to the present distressing symptoms, do not permanently correct the stretched ligaments in the abdominal wall. No system of dieting or exercise, or massage has the power to shorten stretched ligaments. Ligaments and tendons will take the maximum length at which they are held. They must be held CONTINUOUSLY at shorter length, then the ligaments will take the length at which they are held. This is a physiological fact that no authority has ever contradicted. When a woman wears a high heel shoe, the ligaments will shorten whether she exercises or not.

To obtain any real benefit in cases of sagged intestines it is positively necessary to hold the organs up continuously over a period of several months. If while this is being done the person eats wholesome food and exercises so as to improve the tone of the body tissues they can then leave off the belt without the stretching occurring again. A support as adapted by Drs. Poole positively does not rob the muscles of any normal work, the muscles are exercised, just as much with the support on as without it, there is improvement of circulation, improved assimilation and elimination, with freedom from exhausting nervous tension, exercise is made more agreeable and body nutrition easier and the general health immensely improved and the belt can be dispensed with in most cases after 6 to 12 months.

The digestive organs cannot be held up continuously by muscular contraction, no matter how strong a man is, he cannot hold his arm at arm's length all day. Among those who have gone to Drs. Poole and been greatly benefited have been many athletes, men with muscles like iron. But when the muscles were relaxed as they had to be, the organs sagged down just as they do in a person with a flabby abdomen. Exercise, we say again, is all right, but it is likely to stretch the ligaments still more and increase the difficulty unless a support is worn. A person with sagged organs does not have to wear a support all their lives, they can tone up the tissues by proper diet and exercise so that the ligaments will not stretch again and the support can be left off quite comfortably and safely, but if a support is not worn the person will have stretched ligaments, no matter how much money they pay out for advice and treatment, or how carefully they "watch" their diet.

If such support is not worn, then the sufferer will be suffering from a chronic congestion of organs in the abdomen, which will lead to acute troublesome inflammation, that might goad the patient to surgical operation. Gall bladder trouble, urinary bladder trouble, chronic appendicitis, sour stomach, chronic constipation, sluggish liver, loss of pep, extreme nervousness, backache and many other ills have been attributed by eminent medical authorities as arising from low stomach and sagged intestines. Drs. Poole have numerous local testimonials testifying to relief from these conditions, and many others immediately upon wearing a Dr. Poole abdominal support. A Los Angeles man wrote: "I am 78 years old. Before going to you I was more than constipated, I had become so that medicine and enemas would not move me; I had to use other mechanical means to force the matter out of my bowels. Since wearing your support a month ago I have had no more trouble with my bowels. I have easy full movements without taking any medicines or anything else to move them. The support did me more good than all the doctors I tried. It did something the doctors could not do, and did it right away. If anybody does not believe this they can come out to see me." We will be glad to show the original of this testimonial and many others. Prominent people, bank presidents, judges, legislators, etc., have given us permission to mention their name to any one as one of our patients who have received complete relief from constipation or other ills as a result of wearing a Dr. Poole support. It will cost you nothing to consult Dr. Percy H. Poole or Dr. Georgean H. Poole. There is no obligation involved. If a support is advised and used the cost will be a fraction of the money that many people paid out for treatments without obtaining any permanent benefit until they went to Drs. Poole and had a support PROPERLY adapted to meet the special needs of their case. Don't be discouraged. Take the time to see what Drs. Poole do and why. The supports are light, neat and comfortable. 706 S. Hill St., Sun Bldg., Los Angeles, California.

Dr. Poole will give free lectures on low stomach, pink intestines and back ache on Monday, Feb. 3rd, at 8 P.M., 706 S. Hill St.

THE MEXICAN REVOLUTION

By
Fred Hogue

This is the first of a series of articles by Mr. Hogue on the revolutionary history of Mexico. These articles comprise the text of radio addresses given on the subject by Mr. Hogue over KHJ, and are published in response to numerous requests for them in printed form.—[Editor.

Then the avenger comes.

MEXICO! the country where the land is rich and the people impoverished; the land that God favored, and that God forgot; the land where the climate is salubrious; where the soil and the subsoil are capable of producing treasures that few countries of equal area can surpass; but the land of no interior waterways, of not a single river to carry its commerce to the sea. Mexico whose native peoples after seven centuries of bondage are emerging into the light of freedom—it is the Mexico after twenty years of revolution that I salute.

I first visited Mexico when Cleveland was in our own White House and Porfirio Diaz was the President of Mexico and the popular hero of the cultured classes. Since that time I have resided just north of the frontier. I have entered Mexico through seven gates. During her era of storm and stress I have stood, as it were, on a high cliff, watching the turbulent movement of sea and sky, the waves lashed to fury on the ocean beyond.

I have visited Mexico when organized government was only a polite fiction. I have talked with political refugees who returned to triumph, and who returned to meet sudden and violent death. I have known by personal contact men whose names are written on the reeking pages of the Mexican Revolution.

They are all dead now. Most of them met deaths of violence, a death they spurned to shun, and I alone am left to narrate—to lay my simple wreaths of laurel upon their scattered tombs. Others who knew them perhaps less have maligned their memories. An impartial judge pardons or exonerates more often than he condemns. I shall throw no rocks at the coffins of men who, while they lived, none insulted with impunity, except from a safe distance, like dogs baying at the moon.

How the leading figures of the Mexican Revolution stalk in retrospect before me: Madero, Huerta, Reyes, Carranza, Villa, Zapata, Obregon!

According to the popular conception, Mexico has endured twenty revolutions in twenty years; four that brought in turn to the pinnacle of their greatness and to their deaths Madero, Huerta, Carranza and Obregon, and sixteen that failed. But these twenty revolutions were only incidents in one, through which an increasing purpose runs, from Madero to Ortiz Rubio, the President-elect; a revolution to establish a government that rests not on a military dictatorship but on the consent of the governed; a revolution to guarantee to every Mexican citizen the right to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness;" a revolution to establish a government based on human rights; a revolution that marks for the masses the end of seven centuries of servitude and peonage, and the beginning of an era of freedom and equal opportunity.

To understand what has taken place in Mexico in the last twenty years one must delve deep into Mexican history, must go back to the period before the Spanish conquistadors came.

According to Carleton Beals, Mexico's noblest traditions are in her Indian ancestors and Indian culture, and 85 per cent of the present population is of pure or mixed Indian blood. But the Indians of the mountains, plateaus and deserts of Mexico are as different in culture, traditions and habits from the Indians of the north as they are different from the white races of Europe.

The Indians of the North Atlantic were a nomadic race, hunters and fishers — imperious, warlike, courageous. Their chivalry was that of the armed camp. Their only settlements were village communes, and there were no class or caste distinctions. They builded no walled cities. Serfdom and peonage were to them unknown. Fighting to the death, they chose extinction rather than assimilation.

Of another race and traditions were the Indians of Mexico. Their civilization antedated that of England or Spain. Ruins still remain of walled cities older than the Acropolis of Athens.

They were irrigationists—tillers of the soil.

They were irrigationists, tillers of the soil, builders of cities and monuments, industrialists. Their cities and villages were organized into political subdivisions. They possessed a culture comparable to that of their Spanish conquerors. There were greater, nobler artists among the Mayas in the fourteenth century than among the Spaniards. But their civilization, as was the case of all civilizations of the early centuries, was based on human slavery. There were caste distinctions, and the many labored for the profit of the few.

Their development was limited, strangled, by reason of possessing only the most primitive form of transportation. In all their land was no interior waterway, and the Mayas and kindred tribes, while unexcelled as workers in wood and stone never discovered the secret of rotary motion. They invented no wheeled vehicles, and all things to be transported were either dragged on the earth or carried on the backs of men or beasts. Here is a phenomenon that no scientist, no antiquarian has been able to explain. If these ancient tribes came across the Behring Straits from Siberia, why did they not bring with them the secret of circular motion?

In the earliest civilizations of Asia primitive wheeled vehicles were in daily use. How was this secret lost in migration?

Perhaps the cruelty of the Mayas, Aztecs and kindred races has been exaggerated. The forms of religion used by the Aztecs demanded human sacrifices. Their religion was one of blood. But human sacrifice has formed a part of the cult of many primitive peoples.

The Spaniards condemned the sacrifices of the Aztecs, while they were burning Jews and heretics at home. Capital punishment is still regarded by some sects as a form of human sacrifice. They say we sacrifice men to law, and condemn others for sacrificing men to their god; yet we admit that God is greater than the law.

The Indian civilizations of Mexico were inclined to peace. Had they been warlike by nature Cortez and his conquistadors, could never have gained dominion over them. Yet there were wars between the States, and the country was in insurrection when the Spaniards came. According to some authorities, as many Indians fought with the Spaniards as with Montezuma.

It was not difficult for the Spaniards to acquire dominion over the Indian races of Mexico, because the machinery of government was already established. Who possessed the head possessed the whole.

Moreover the system of peonage, of human slavery was already established. When the early grants were made the owners of the land were the owners of the native population occupying the land. Their chief worth was in the grant of man power, and the grant extended to the third, fourth and even fifth generations.

During the Spanish rule only Spaniards were permitted to establish a residence in Mexico, and all the commerce of the colony was reserved to Spain. This monopoly kept the native races in perpetual serfdom.

After Mexico won its independence from Spain the submerged millions passed from slavery to peonage, and breaking up this system of peonage was the ambition that brought the native peoples of Mexico into the struggle for dominion among the ruling class. I know by personal contact what peonage meant in Mexico at the time the Madero revolution was fomented in 1909.

To cultivate much of the arable land of Mexico irrigation is necessary. This necessitates an accumulation of capital to dig the ditches, impound the waters and level the lands. The laborers were no longer shackled to the haciendas. But the laborers possessed no means of irrigating the small plots on which they might be settled, so they were compelled to serve the great property owners as hired laborers.

The governing minority, mostly of an alien race, had been concerned only in getting the greatest amount of man power for the least expenditure of money or its equivalent. There was one code of morals for the governing class,

CARE OF THE BODY

By Philip M. Lovell, N. D.

Author of "Diet for Health" and "The Health of the Child"

Ptosis

This is a disease which is found in at least 80 to 85 per cent of all people—male and female—past the age of 45. It means the dropping of the abdominal and pelvic organs below their normal position.

Something is wrong with your stomach. You go to the doctor who takes an X-ray. The X-ray shows that the stomach is dropped two to five inches lower than it should be.

Something is wrong with your intestines. Again you visit the radiographer who tells you, perhaps, that your colon is dropped.

The same may be true of the bladder, the uterus—in fact, any organs of the pelvis.

The causes of ptosis may be divided into three or four different groups and when the causes are understood, the remedy is apparent.

The commonest reason why so many suffer from ptosis and dropping of the stomach is the fact that we eat too much. A huge ten or twelve-course meal will pouch the stomach, dilate it and cause the muscles to be strained. The muscles become weak, especially if we do not take any form of exercise, and as a result, the stomach falls.

The same is true of the intestines or of any other structure.

The next cause is lack of exercise.

Many housewives will say that when they finish the day's work they are tired.

Quite true—but not abdominally tired. The pelvic organs are not tired. They are tired because of the nervous strain of conducting the household. They are tired because of irritation, discord, worry or anxiety.

How many of them take vigorous abdominal work?

The question of exercise plays a very important part. The failure to take exercise is the main reason for the falling of the abdominal organs. The correction of the abdominal ptosis or mal-position can be achieved by exercise as well.

The next cause of ptosis is poor posture.

Observe yourself in the privacy of your own room. Stand without any particular attention to yourself and see how you stand or sit. You will usually find that the abdomen is thrust forward, the shoulders are hunched and the head is bent slightly forward.

When we have a postural situation of this kind the result is inevitable. The organs do not receive the proper support.

The next cause for the presence of ptosis is surgery.

An operation generally means that an organ in the body has been taken out. When we remove one or more organs from the cavity, the remaining organs fall to take their place.

Then we have adhesions and prolapses as the result of the removal of the organ.

Botulinus Poisoning

Every once in a while the newspapers announce a case or a series of cases of botulinus poisoning. They say that after such-and-such a party so many people were sick and so many died from the consumption of a certain item of food.

About five years ago the olive industry was given a very serious blow by such unfavorable newspaper publicity. To botulinus poisoning from the consumption of olives was attributed, at that time, the death of several people.

It was typically characteristic of newspaper sensationalism.

The olive industry has scarcely recovered from the blow.

Periodically the same scare is voiced about other foods.

The public knows very little about botulism but is very easily frightened. Consequently, the article below by Dr. Anne Brekke, osteopathic physician, is indeed apropos, for it sheds considerably more light upon the subject.

A better understanding of botulinus poisoning will lead to a better knowledge of food selection and a keener understanding of methods of prevention.

Occurrence

"Botulism is a rare disease but it is much more common in Europe than in America. Not a single outbreak has come to light in England, Scotland and Wales. The high mortality, the distressing symptoms and the relation to food have dramatic news value and the disease has recently caused concern and alarm out of all proportion to its prevalence. Since its isolation in 1894, this germ has caused very few deaths and cannot be compared in magnitude with tuberculosis, syphilis and other public health problems.

"Botulism presents no particular distribution as to sex, age, season or social conditions.

"Botulism is one of the causes of forage poisoning in horses and of limberneck in chickens and turkeys, and may also be responsible for various types of paralysis in domestic animals, including dogs.

Symptoms

"The earliest symptom is usually a peculiar definite indisposition, associated with a feeling of fatigue, sometimes headache and dizziness and definite muscular weakness.

"When the period of incubation is short, the first symptoms may be gastric distress, nausea, vomiting and occasionally diarrhea.

"This makes diagnosis questionable, for botulism differs from the common type of food poisoning, in that there are usually no indications of acute gastro-intestinal irritation. Constipation is an almost constant manifestation of the condition.

"A striking feature is the progressive weakness which, in severe cases, closely simulates paralysis. Inco-ordination of muscular movement is common. The paralysis is, in a general way, an ascending paralysis manifesting itself first in the intestines.

"The duration varies greatly. Death may occur in forty-eight hours after eating the poisonous food. As a rule, it occurs in from four to eight days, and few die after ten days. Dickson reports one death on the twenty-sixth day. Death usually is due primarily to respiratory failure. Convalescence is extremely slow and tedious.

"The disturbances of vision and weakness may last for months.

Mortality

"The mortality of botulism has varied greatly in different outbreaks, depending upon the amount and virulence of the toxin. In certain instances it has been extremely high—in some, one hundred per cent, but in others it has been correspondingly low.

Thermal Death Point of the Spore

"To safeguard against botulism in canned foods, the thermal death point of the spore has been determined. The various factors such as the age of the spore, number of spores, strain differences, hydrogenion concentration, effects of desiccation, and so forth, which influence the thermal death point were also determined.

"Weiss found that under the most favorable conditions for survival, the most resistant types require five hours at boiling point, forty minutes at 105 degrees centigrade, fifteen minutes at 110 degrees centigrade and six minutes at 120 degrees centigrade.

"Note the difference in the thermal death point of the spore of this bacillus and the poisons it creates; also that it is an anaerobe, meaning that it thrives best without air—therefore, the danger of sausage and canned foods not cooked long enough to kill the spores.

"On the other hand, since 1894, when it was first studied, this germ has killed very few people. I am told that only two cases have been diagnosed in the Los Angeles General Hospital—in fact, very few cases have appeared in America and none in the British Isles.

"Another very interesting point is that the bacillus is practically harmless if swallowed, as it does not grow readily in the human digestive tract, while the poison it produces when grown on meat, fish or vegetables is so very deadly.

The Botulinus Toxin

"It has been possible to obtain a toxin of which 0.000001 c.c. would kill a 250 gram guinea pig in from three to four days.

Food Involved in Botulism

"It was originally thought that botulinus would grow only in sausage or meat, but it is now known that the presence of animal protein is not necessary for its growth. In Europe, the foods involved in outbreaks have been mainly meats such as sausage and ham but in America other foods have been involved such as string beans, cottage cheese, corn, asparagus salad, spinach and ripe olives. Botulism has also been attributed to turkey, beef, chicken and fish.

"Suspicion often falls upon the wrong food. The period of incubation is usually eighteen to thirty-six hours, and the first symptoms may be nausea and vomiting. Several meals will have been taken between the time of eating the afraire. His brother was dead, and frightfully dead, but there was tomorrow for grief. Just now there were many things to do. There were people to be gotten rid of. With short words and angry gestures he cleared them out, all but Darred and a man named White, and to these he said, "Now, first thing, Jim can't stay here." He ran and got a blanket from a closet. "Give me a hand and we'll lay him in the bedroom."

"Yes, yes, Blossie—now, yes—only you best give me that gun; that's the girlie." When he had got the weapon he put an arm around her shoulders. "Yes, yes, course we're going to shoot him; what you think? Don't want an animal like that running 'round. Now, first thing in the morning—"

Hysteria returned. With its strength she resisted his leading.

His face grew hot. An impulse carried him a dozen steps. "I ought to go up. Ought to take the gun and go up." But there shrewd sanity put on the brake. "Where's the use? Couldn't find him in this dark. Besides, I ought't to leave Blossom here alone."

With that he went around toward the kitchen, thinking to go in. But the White's mount—a mare—laid back her ears, ahied, and stood trembling. After a moment she whimnied.

It was as if she had whinnied for a dozen. A crashing in the woods, above them to the left and the avalanche came—downstream, erupting, wheeling, wheeling away with yollering snorts, a dark rout.

BLUE MURDER

Another of O. Henry Memorial Award Selections

By WILBUR DANIEL STEELE

AT MILL CROSSING it was already past sunset. The rays still laid fire along the woods crowning the stony slopes of Jim Bluedge's pastures; but then the line of the dusk began and from that level it filled the valley, washing with transparent blue the buildings scattered about the bridge, Jim's house and horse sheds and hay barns, Frank's store and Camden's blacksmith shop.

Of the three brothers Camden was the dumb one. He seldom had anything to say. It was providential (folks said) that of the three enterprises at the Crossing one was a smithy; for while he was a strong, big, hungry-muscled fellow, he never would have had the shrewdness to run the store or the farm. He was better at pounding—pounding while the field reddened and the sparks flew, and thinking, and letting other people wonder what he was thinking of.

Blossom Bluedge, his brother's wife, sat perched on the top bar of the paddock gate, holding her skirts around her ankles with a trifle too much care to be quite unconscious, and watched him work.

"You'd have thought Jim would be home before this, wouldn't you, Cam?"

Her brother-in-law said nothing.

He was too dumb for any use. He was as dumb as this: When all three of the Bluedge boys were after her a year ago, Frank, the storekeeper, had brought her candy: chocolates wrapped in silver foil in a two-pound Boston box. Jim had laid before her the Bluedge farm and with it the dominance of the valley. And Camden! To the daughter of Ed Beck, the apple grower, Camden had brought a box of apples!—and had been bewildered, too, when, for all she could help it, she had to clap a hand over her mouth and run into the house to have her giggle.

"Camden," she reverted suddenly. "Tell me one thing, did you hear—"

She stopped there. Some people were coming into the kitchen yard, dark forms in the growing darkness. Most of them lingered at the porch, sitting on the steps and lighting their pipes. The one that came out was Frank, the second of her brothers-in-law. She was glad. Frank wasn't like Camden, he would talk. Turning and taking care of her skirts, she gave him a bright and sisterly smile.

"Well, Frankie, what's the crowd?"

Far from avoiding the smile, as Camden's habit was, the storekeeper returned it with a brotherly wink for good measure. "Oh, they're tired of waiting down the road, so they come up here to see the grand arrival." He was something of a man of the world; in his calling he had acquired a fine turn of skepticism. "Don't want to miss being on hand to see what flaws they can pick in 'Jim's five hundred dollars' wurth of expiriment.'"

"Frank, ain't you the least bit worried over Jim? So late?"

"Don't see why. Had all the men from Perry's stables there in Twinshead to help him get the animal off the freight, and he took an extra rope and the log chain and the heavy wagon, so I guess no matter how wild and woolly the devil is he'll scarcely be climbing in over the tailboard. Besides, them western horses ain't such a big breed, even a stallion."

"All the same—(look the other way, Frankie)—" Flipping her ankles over the rail, Blossom jumped down beside him. "Listen, Frank, tell me something, did you hear—did you hear the reason Jim's getting him cheap was because he killed a man out West there, what's-its-name, Wyoming?"

Frank was taking off his sleeve protectors, the pins in his mouth. It was Camden, at the bars, speaking in his sudden deep rough way, "Who the hell told you that?"

Frank got the pins out of his mouth. "I guess what it is, Blossie, what's mixed you up is his having that name Blue Murder."

Jim had arrived. With a clatter of hoofs and a rattle of wheels, he was in the yard and come to a standstill, calling aloud as he threw the lines over the team, "Well, friends, here we are."

The curious began to edge around, closing a cautious circle. The dusk had deepened so that it was hard to make anything at any distance of Jim's "expiriment" but a blurry silhouette anchored at the wagon's tail.

"Oh, Jim, I'm so glad you come. I been so worried; gi' me a kiss!"

The farmer reddened, eyeing the cloud of witnesses. He felt awkward and wished she could have waited. "Get along, didn't I tell you fellows?" he cried with a trace of the Bluedge temper. "Go wait in the kitchen then; I'll tell you all about everything soon's I come in . . . Well, now—wife—"

Camden wasn't looking at them. Still standing with his hammer two-fisted and his legs spread, his chin down and his thoughts to himself (the dumbhead) he was looking at Blue Murder, staring at the other dumbhead, which, raised high on the motionless column of the stallion's neck, seemed hearkening with an exile's doubt to the sounds of this new universe, tasting with wide nostrils the taint in the wind of equine strangers, and studying with eyes accustomed to far horizons these dark pastures that went up in the air.

Whatever the smith's cogitations, presently he let the hammer down and said aloud, "So you're him, eh?"

Jim had put Blossom aside, saying, "Got supper ready? I'm hungry!" Excited by the act of kissing and the sense of witnesses to it, she fussed her hair and started kitchenward as he turned to his brothers.

"Well, what do you make of him?"

"Five hundred dollars," said Frank. "However, it's your money."

Camden was shorter. "Better put him in."

"All right; let them bars down while I and Frank lead him around."

"No, thanks!" The storekeeper kept his hands in his pockets. "I just cleaned up, thanks. Cam's the boy for horses."

"He's none o' my horses!" Camden wet his lips, shook his shoulders, and scowled. "Be damned, no!"

"Unless," Frank put in slyly, "unless Cam's scared."

"Scared?" And still, to the brothers' enduring wonder, the big dense fellow would rise to that boyhood bait. "Scared? The hell I'm scared of any horse ever wore a shoe! Come on, I'll show you!"

"Well, be gentle with him, boys; he may be brittle." As Frank sauntered off around the shed he whistled the latest tune.

In the warmth and light of the kitchen he began to fool with his pretty sister-in-law, feigning princely impatience and growling with a wink at the assembled neighbors, "When do we eat?"

But she protested, "Land, I had everything ready since five, ain't I? And now, if it ain't you, it's them to wait for."

At last one of the gossips got in a word.

"What you make of Jim's purchase, Frank?"

"Well, it's Jim's money, Darred. If I had the running of this farm—" Frank began drawing up chairs noisily, leaving it at that.

Darred persisted. "Don't look to me much like an animal for women and children to handle, not yet awhile."

Blossom put the kettle back, protesting, "Leave off, or you'll get me worried to death; all your talk . . . I declare, where are those bad boys?" Opening the door she called into the dark, "Jim! Cam!"

Subdued by distance and the intervening sheds, she could hear them at their business—sounds muffled with fragmentary, soft thunder of hoofs, snorts, puffings and the short words of men in action: "Aw, leave him be in the paddock tonight." . . . "With them mares there, you damn fool?" . . . "Damn fool, eh? Try getting him in at that door and see who's the damn fool!" . . . "Come on, don't be so scared." . . . "Scared, eh?"

Why was it she always felt that curious tightening of all her powers of attention when Camden spoke? Probably because he spoke so rarely, and then so roughly, as if his own thickness made him mad. Never mind.

"Last call for supper in the dining car, boys!" she called, and closed the door. Turning back to the stove she was about to replace the tea water for the third time when, straightening up, she said, "What's that?"

No one else had heard anything. They looked at one another.

"Frank, go—go see what—go tell the boys to come in."

Frank hesitated, feeling foolish, then went to the door.

Then everyone in the room was out of his chair.

There were three sounds. The first was human and incoherent. The second was incoherent, too, but it wasn't human. The third was a crash, a ripping and splintering of wood.

When they got to the paddock they found Camden crawling from beneath the wreckage of the fence where a gap was opened on the pasture side. He must have received a blow on the head, for he seemed dazed. He didn't seem to know they were there. At a precarious balance—one hand at the back of his neck—he stood facing up the hill, gaping after the diminuendo of floundering hoofs, invisible above.

So seconds passed. Again the beast gave tongue, a high wild horning note, and on the black of the stony hill to the right of it a faint shower of sparks blew like fireflies where the herding mares wheeled. It seemed to awaken the dazed smith. He opened his mouth. "Almighty God!" Swinging, he flung his arms toward the shed. "There! There!"

At last some one brought a lantern. They found Jim Bluedge lying on his back in the corner of the paddock near the door to the shed. In the lantern light, and still better in the kitchen when they had carried him in, they read the record of the thing which Camden, dumb in good earnest now, seemed unable to tell them with anything but his strange unfocussed stare.

The bloody offense to the skull would have been enough to kill the man, but it was the second, full on the chest above the heart, that told the tale. On the caved grating of the ribs, already turning blue under the yellowish down, the iron shoe had left its mark, and when, laying back the rag of shirt, they saw that the toe of the shoe was upward and the cutting caulkends down they knew all they wanted to know of that swift, black, crushing episode.

No outlash here of heels in fright. Here was a forefoot. An attack aimed and frontal; an onslaught reared, erect; beast turned biped; red eyes mad to white eyes aghast . . . And only afterward, when it was done, the blood-fright that serves for horses for conscience; the blind rush across the enclosure; the fence gone down . . .

No one had much to say. No one seemed to know what to do.

As for Camden, he was no help. He simply stood propped on top of his logs of legs where some one had left him.

It was lucky that Frank was a man of

The lake water was too chill for comfort, and a cloud came over the sun. Dorn said, "Shall we go in? I noticed a storm coming. If you'll let me be the first to change clothes . . . I've got a chore I must do."

In the cabin he dressed quickly, and taking the rifle he had left with Aurore, he paddled around to one of the tiny islets. A band of grizzly caribou, tame as all unhunted wilderness animals are tame, had been staring fixedly at Aurore and him from a thicket of devil's club. He shot a yearling and brought back the choice portions.

He was looking out for Aurore in case of some "accident" to himself.

The supper Aurore prepared was a treat to Dorn, who was about burned out on his own cooking. She knew how to plank trout on cedar slabs. Across on the mainland she had gathered six-inch shoots of the creeping raspberry, succulent as asparagus. Somewhere she had found a bed of bracken fern, whose root-bulbs were quite like potatoes. There was white bread baked in ashes, and a tart of Arctic cranberries, and coffee with cream in tablet form.

Afterward they drew chairs up to the fireplace and Dorn blanketed one for Aurore. A storm lashed the pine-tops and the rain came down in wave-like inundations. They listened to the terrific thunder crashes that struck against the mountain slopes and rolled bellowing across the lake; and they had little to say until the worst of the storm had passed and the rain settled into a steady downpour.

"Jim"—Aurore's voice broke the silence of half an hour—"you've heard, I know you've heard, of Roger McNain."

Though he had been out of touch with his native province for many years, Dorn had heard the name and knew the reputation of the famous engineer. A man of broad interests, he had risen out of his profession and become leader of a powerful reform party. Guiding spirit in a dozen huge enterprises, he had stood like a rock in a torrent, blocking political graft and exposing scandals and waste; and he had won the trust and the love of that tribunal whom the politician calls "my dear people."

"Roger McNain was my father, Jim," she said quietly.

Her revelation came as a surprise; Dorn had never connected her name with McNain, the engineer and scientist and fighter. But he scarcely gave it a second thought then, for he knew Aurore had not told him that for its own sake, but as preparation for something to come.

"He was more than a father," she went on. "More than just the cause of my being. Everywhere on all his work he took me with him. I never went to school a day till I was seventeen. He was a builder, Jim. And I think he tried, with the patience and loving care of an artist, to make me his best piece of work. But there's a danger—looking back now I can see it—a danger in what he tried. If he had lived, he might have completed his work. But he died. He'd been my whole world; I was lost and had no one to turn to. I wasn't altogether to blame for what—what I fell into later. I was young and pliable. My mother meant to do well, according to her ideals . . ."

"Your mother?" Dorn echoed. "I thought—you didn't mention her—I thought she was dead."

"She's still living. In Victoria. But I hardly saw her once a season during those seventeen years. She didn't like the bush, she never went with Dad on his locations; her life was in the city—clubs and social affairs. It was Dad and me for it. They didn't separate, because Dad abhorred divorce, and mother—it's a cruel thing to say, but it's the truth—mother needed the money he made. So they kept up appearances.

"I went to live with her after he died. She didn't like the way he'd fashioned me. In her eyes I was a young barbarian. Looking back on it, I can see she tried to take down piece by piece what he'd built, and put it together again—according to her ideals. The consequences for me . . . Jim, it's a terrible power a parent has; a power to shipwreck or to build beautifully; and, Jim, I—I was shipwrecked."

There Aurore paused again, and Dorn knew that still she had not told him everything she intended, but was fighting desperately for the courage to go on.

"I didn't mean to come to you that first night, Jim. I wanted Dad Bergelot to find old Luke; I knew Luke would bring me north. But he said your airplane was a quicker, safer way to escape. I was frightened at the thought of coming to a stranger, for I'd be in his power; but Dad Bergelot persuaded me. He said you were . . . he didn't use the word 'Victorian,' but that is what he meant. And I've found you so, Jim—in the noblest meaning of the word. You do have ideals that aren't common or even fashionable just now. I believe, I know, you'd play any game square. If you'd ever come to love a girl and your sense of honor said you couldn't have her, you'd never turn to any ignoble way."

Dorn stiffened, suddenly aware that here was what Aurore had meant to tell him. Here she was implying that old Bergelot's "Can never" was true.

Doggedly he fought against the conviction. He asked, "Aurore, what did you mean when you said 'If I could never have her'?"

He felt the tremble of her fingers in his clasp. The fire-glow was on her face and tangled in her hair. Her words, when she spoke again, were still beneath the surface, but the import of them was cataclysmic to Dorn, for he knew Aurore was speaking pointedly of herself and of him. She said:

"I mean, Jim, if she were something or had done something which violated your sense of honor. I mean, if a barrier stood between you and her—a barrier as immutable and deep as life." Aurore paused there while a thunder-phrase, gathering and rumbling for many moments in the heavens, sent its bolt crashing down upon a great pine on the island. When the echoes of it had died away to sullen whispers, Aurore added, with deadly calmness: "I mean, if you could have her only by degrading yourself and her—which you would never do and which she would never allow you if you would."

Before Dorn would release her clasp, he asked one question, so there would be no chance of mistake:

"Aurore, does that barrier stand between you and me?"

And Aurore, in a whisper, answered him: "Yes, between you and me, Jim."

In the whipporwill dusk Aurore went with him down to the cove, along the sodden path and through the rain-wet bushes. Nothing more was spoken between them.

At the water's edge, where Dorn had upturned his canoe, Aurore asked, "Have you told Mr. Eby about me being here, Jim?"

"No."

"But you'll tell him now."

Dorn guessed her thoughts. His voice was husky; it sounded odd to his own ears:

"You mean I won't come again? That I'll send him—here? No, I won't, Aurore. When there's need of it, I'll come. I'll see after you—till you go away."

Aurore would not deny him that. She gave him her hand in good-by and it seemed to Dorn that they clasped hands across an abyss.

the floor where on the night before they had laid Jim, he seemed hardly to comprehend.

"What's wrong with Frank?"

"Some more of Jim's 'expiriment.'"

"Frank see him? He's scared, Frank is. Look at his face there."

"He's dead, Cam."

"Dead, you say? Frank dead? Dead of fright, is that it?"

Even when, rolling the body over, they showed him what was what, he appeared incapable of comprehension, of amazement, of passion, or of any added grief. He looked at them all with a kind of befuddled protest. Returning to his chair and his plate, he grumbled, "Le' me eat first, can't you. Can't you gi' me a little time to sleep?"

"Well, you wouldn't do much tonight, anyway, I guess."

At White's words Blossom opened her mouth for the first time.

"No, nothing tonight, Cam. Cam! Camden! Say! Promise!"

"And then tomorrow, Cam, what we'll do is to get every last man in the valley, and we'll go at this right. We'll lay hand on that devil—"

Camden swallowed his mouthful of cold steak with difficulty. His obsession touched, he showed them the rims of his eyes again.

"You do and I'll wring your necks. The man that touches that animal before I do gets his neck wrang. That's all you need to remember."

"Yes, yes—no—that is—" Poor Blossom. "Yes, Mr. White, thanks; no, Cam's not going out tonight . . . No, Cam, nobody's going to interfere—nor nothing. Don't you worry there . . ."

Lightning filled the windows. After a moment the thunder came avalanching down the pasture and brought up against the clapboards of the house. At this she was behind his chair. She put out a hand. She touched his shoulder.

Camden blundered up. "What the hell!" He started off two steps and wheeled on her. "Why don't you get off to bed, for Goll sake!"

"Yes, Cam, yes—right off, yes."

"Well, I'm going, I can tell you. For Goll sake, I need some sleep!"

It took her no time to get along then—quick and quiet as a mouse.

As it had taken her no time to go, it took Blossom no time to undress and get in bed. When Camden was on his way to his room he heard her calling, "Cam! Just a second, Cam!"

"Yes? What?"

"Cam, set by me a minute, won't you? And Cam, oh, Cam, hold my hand."

As he slouched down, his fist inclosing her fingers, thoughts awakened and ran and fastened on things. They fastened, tentatively at first, upon the farm. Jim gone. Frank gone. The smithy, the store and the farm. The whole of Mill Crossing. The trinity. The three in one . . .

"Tight, Cam, for pity's sake! Hold it tight!"

His eyes, falling to his fist, strayed up along the arm it held. The sleeve, rumpled near the shoulder, was trimmed with pretty lace . . .

"Tighter, Cam!"

A box of apples. That memory hidden away in the cellar of his mind. Hidden away, clamped down in the dark, till the noxious vapors, the murderous vapors of its rotting had filled the shut-up house he was . . . A box of red apples for the apple-grower's girl . . . the girl who sniggered and ran away from him to laugh at him . . .

And there, by the unfolding of a devious destiny, he sat in that girl's bedroom, holding that girl's hand. Jim who had got her, Frank who had wanted her lay side by side out there in the ice-house under the lightning. While he, the "dumb one"—the last to be thought of with anything but amusement and the last to be feared—his big hot fist inclosing her imprecating hand now, and his eyes on the pretty lace at her shoulder—he jumped up with a gulp and a clatter of iron.

"What the—" He flung her hand away. "What the—hell!" He swallowed.

He moderated his voice with an effort, wiping his brow. "Good night. You must excuse me, Blossie; I wasn't meaning—I mean—I hope you sleep good. I shall . . . Good night!"

In his own brain was the one word, "Hurry!"

She lay and listened to his boots going along the hall and heard the closing of his door. She ought to have put out the lamp. But even with the shades drawn, the lightning around the edges of the window unnerved her; in the dark alone it would have been more than she could bear.

She lay so till she felt herself nearing exhaustion from the sustained rigidity of her limbs. Rain came and with the rain, wind. Around the eaves it neighed like wild stallions; down the chimneys it moaned like men.

Slipping out of bed and pulling on a bathrobe she ran from her room, barefooted, and along the hall to Camden's door.

"Cam!" she called. "Oh, Cam!" she begged. "Please, please!"

And now he wouldn't answer her.

She pushed the door open. The lamp was burning on the bureau, but the room was empty and the bed untouched.

Camden had reached the woods when the rain came. Lighting the lantern he had brought, he made his way on to the boundary fence. There, about a mile to the east of the path the others had taken that day, he pulled the rails down and tumbled the stones together in a pile. Then he proceeded another hundred yards, holding the lantern high and peering through the streaming crystals of the rain.

Blue Murder was there. Neither the chain nor the sapling had given way. The lantern and, better than lantern, a globe of lightning, showed the tethered stallion glistening and quivering, his eyes all whites at the man's approach.

"Gentle, boy; steady, boy!" Talking all the while in the way he had with horses, Camden put a hand on the taut chain and bore with a gradually progressive weight, bringing the dark head nearer. "Steady, boy; gentle there, damn you; gentle!"

Was he afraid of horses? Who was it said he was afraid of horses?

"Steady, Goll damn you; you're going to get yours. Cheer up, cheer up, the worst is yet to come. Come now! Come easy! Come along!"

When he had unloosed the chain he felt for and found with his free hand his hammer hidden behind the tree. Throwing the lantern into the brush, where it flared for an instant before dying, he led the stallion back as far as the break he had made in the fence. Taking a turn with the chain around the animal's nose, like an improvised hackamore, he swung from the stone pile to the slippery back. A moment's shying, a sliding caracole of amazement and distrust, a crushing of knees, a lash of the chain-end, and that was all there was to that. Blue Murder had been ridden before . . .

In the smithy, Camden sang as he pumped his bellows, filling the cave beneath the rafters with red. The air was nothing, the words were mumbo-jumbo, but they swelled his chest. His eyes, cast from time to time at his wheeling prisoner, had lost their look of helplessness and surly distraction.

Scared? He? No, no, no! Now that he wasn't any longer afraid of time, he wasn't afraid of anything on earth.

"Shy, you devil!" He wagged his exalted head. "Whicker, you hellion! Whicker all you want to, studhorse! Tomorrow they're going to get you, the numb fools. Tomorrow they can have you. I got you tonight!"

He was more than other men; he was enormous. Fishing an iron shoe from that inseparable apron pocket of his, he thrust it into the coals and blew and blew. He tried it and it was burning red. He tried it again and it was searing white. Taking it out on the anvil, he began to beat it, swinging his hammer one-handed, gigantic. So in the crimson light, irradiating iron sparks, he was at his greatest. Pounding, pounding. A man in the dark of night with a hammer about him can do wonders; with a horseshoe about him he can cover up a sin. And if the dark of night in a paddock won't hold it, then the dark of undergrowth on a mountainside will . . .

Pounding, pounding; thinking, thinking, in a great halo of hot stars. Feeding his hungry, his insatiable muscles.

What he did not realize in his feverish exaltation was that his muscles were not insatiable. In the thirty-odd hours past they had had a feast spread before them and they had had their fill . . . More than their fill.

As with the scorching iron in his tongs he approached the stallion, he had to step over the nailbox he had stepped over five thousand times in the routine of every day.

His foot was heavier of a sudden than it should have been. This five thousand and first time, by the drag of the tenth of an inch, the heel caught the lip of the nailbox.

He tried to save himself from stumbling. At the same time, instinctively, he held the iron flame in his tongs away.

There was a scream out of a horse's throat; a whiff of hair and burnt flesh.

There was a lash of something in the red shadows. There was another sound and another wisp of stench . . .

When, guided by the stallion's whinnying, they found the smith next day, they saw by the cant of his head that his neck was broken, and they perceived that he, too, had on him the mark of a shoe. It lay up one side of his throat and the broad of a cheek. It wasn't blue this time, however—it was red. It took them some instants in the sunshine pouring through the wide door to comprehend this phenomenon. It wasn't sunk in by a blow this time; it was burned in, a brand.

Darred called them to look at the stallion, chained behind the forge.

"Almighty God!" The words sounded funny in his mouth. They sounded the funnier in that they were the same ones the blundering smith had uttered when, staring uphill from his clever wreckage of the paddock fence, he had seen the mares striking sparks from the stones where the stallion struck none. And he, of all men, a smith!

"Almighty God!" called Darred. "What you make of these here feet?"

One forehoof was freshly pared for shoeing; the other three hoofs were as virgin as any yearling's on the plains. Blue Murder had never been shod . . .

BLUE MURDER

Another of the Henry Memorial Award Selections
By WILLIAM DANIEL STEELE

affairs. His brother was dead, and frightfully dead, but there was tomorrow for grief. Just now there were many things to do. There were people to be gotten rid of. With short words and angry gestures he cleared them out, all but Darred and a man named White, and to these he said, "Now, first thing, Jim can't stay here." He ran and got a blanket from a closet. "Give me a hand and we'll lay him in the icehouse overnight. Don't sound good, but it's best, poor fellow. Cam, come along!"

He waited a moment, and as he studied the wooden fool the blood poured back into his face. "Wake up, Cam! You great big scared stiff, you!"

Camden brought his eyes out of nothingness and looked at his brother. A twinge passed over his face, convulsing the mouth muscles. "Scared?"

"Yes, you're scared!" Frank's lip lifted, showing the tips of his teeth. "And I'll warrant you something: If you wasn't the scared stiff you was, this hellish damn thing wouldn't have happened, maybe. Scared! You a blacksmith! Scared of a horse!"

"Even then he didn't seem to comprehend her return but stood blinking at her, and at the rifle she carried."

"Horse!" Again that convulsion of the mouth muscles, something between irony and an idiot craft. "Why don't you go catch 'im?"

"Hush it! Don't waste time by going loony now, for God's sake. Come!"

"My advice to anybody—" Camden looked crazier than ever, knitting his brows. "My advice to anybody is to let somebody else go catch that—that—" Opening the door he faced out into the night, his head sunk between his shoulders and the fingers working at the ends of his hanging arms; and before they knew it he began to swear. He stopped only when at a sharp word from Frank he was made aware that Blossom had come back into the room. Even then he didn't seem to comprehend her return, but stood blinking at her, and at the rifle she carried, with his distraught bloodshot eyes.

Frank comprehended. Hysteria had followed the girl's blankness. Stepping between her and the body on the floor, he spoke in a persuasive, unhurried way. "What you doing with that gun, Blossie? Now, now, you don't want that gun, you know you don't."

It worked. Her rigidity lessened appreciably. Confusion gained.

"Yes, yes, Blossie—now, yes—only you best give me that gun; that's the girlie." When he had got the weapon he put an arm around her shoulders. "Yes, yes, course we're going to shoot him; what you think? Don't want an animal like that running 'round. Now, first thing in the morning—"

Hysteria returned. With its strength she resisted his leading.

"No, now! Now! He's gone and killed Jim! Killed my husband! I won't have him left alive another minute! I won't! Now! No, sir. I'm going myself, I am Frank, I am! Cam!"

At his name, appealed to in that queer screeching way, the man in the doorway shivered all over, wet his lips, and walked out into the dark.

"There, you see?" Frank was quick to capitalize anything. "Cam's gone to do it. Cam's gone, Blossie! . . . Here, one of you—Darred, take this gun and run and give it to Camden, that's the boy."

"You sure he'll kill him, Frank? You sure?"

"Sure as daylight. Now you come along back to your room like a good girl and get some rest. Come, I'll go with you."

When Frank returned to the kitchen ten minutes later, Darred was back.

"Well, now, let's get at it and carry out poor Jim; he can't lay here . . . Where's Cam gone now, damn him!"

"Up the pasture, like you said."

"Like I—" Frank went an odd color. He walked to the door. Between the light on the sill and the beginnings of the stars where the woods crowned the mountain was all one blackness. One stillness, too. He turned on Darred. "But, look, you never gave him that gun, even."

"He didn't want it."

"The damned fool!"

Poor dead Jim! Poor fool Camden! As the storekeeper went about his business and afterward when, the icehouse door closed on its tragic tenant and White and Darred had gone off home, he roamed the yard, driven here and there, soft-footed, waiting, hearkening—his mind was for a time not his own property, but the plaything of thoughts diverse and wayward.

Jim gone . . . And Camden, at any moment . . .

His face grew hot. An impulse carried him a dozen steps. "I ought to go up. Ought to take the gun and go up." But there shrewd sanity put on the brakes. "Where's the use? Couldn't find him in this dark. Besides, I oughtn't to leave Blossom here alone."

With that he went around toward the kitchen, thinking to go in. But the sight of the lantern, left burning out near the sheds, sent his ideas off on another course. At any rate, it would give his muscles and nerves something to work on. Taking the lantern and entering the paddock, he fell to patching the gap into the pasture, using broken boards from the wreck. As he worked his eyes chanced to fall on footprints in the dung-mixed earth—Camden's footprints, leading away beyond the little ring of light. And beside them, taking off from the landing-place of that prodigious leap, he discerned the trail of the stallion. After a moment he got down on his knees where the earth was softest, holding the lantern so that its light fell full.

He gave over his fence-building. Returning to the house his gait was no longer that of the roamer; his face, caught by the periodic flare of the swinging lantern, was the face of another man. In its expression there was a kind of fright and a kind of calculating eagerness. He looked at the clock on the kitchen shelf, shook it, and read it again. He went to the telephone and fumbled at the receiver. He waited till his hand quit shaking, then removed it from the hook.

"Listen, Darred," he said, when he had got the farmer at last, "get White and whatever others you can and come over first thing it's light. Come a-riding and bring your guns. No, Cam ain't back."

He heard Blossom calling. Outside her door he passed one hand down over his face, as he might have passed a washrag, to wipe off what was there. Then he went in.

"What's the matter with Blossie? Can't sleep?"

He sat down beside the bed.

"Oh, Frankie, Frankie, hold my hand!"

Pretty Blossom Beck. Here, for a wonder, he sat in her bedroom and held her hand. One brother was dead and the other was on the mountain.

But little by little, as he sat and dreamed so, nightmare crept over his brain. He had to arouse and shake himself. He had to set his thoughts resolutely in other roads . . . Perhaps there would be even the smithy. The smithy, the store, the farm. Complete. The farm, the farmhouse, the room in the farmhouse, the bed in the room, the wife in the bed. Complete beyond belief. If . . . worth dodging horror for. If . . .

Far from rounding up their quarry in the early hours after dawn, it took the riders, five of them, till almost noon simply to make certain that he wasn't to be found—not in any of the pastures. Then, when they discovered the hole in the fence far up in the woods beyond the crest, where Blue Murder had led the mares in a break for the open country of hills and ravines to the south, they were only at the beginning.

Frank did the trailing. Hopeless of getting anywhere before sundown in that unkempt wilderness of a hundred square miles of scrub, his companions slouched in their saddles and rode more and more mechanically, knee to knee, and it was he who made the casts to recover the lost trail and, dismounting to read the dust, cried back: "He's still with 'em," and with gestures of imperious excitement beckoned them on.

"Which you mean?" Darred asked him once. "Cam or the horse?"

Frank wheeled his beast and spurred back at the speaker. It was extraordinary. "You don't know what you're talking about!" he cried, with a causelessness and a disordered vehemence which set them first staring, then speculating. "Come on, you dumbheads; don't talk—ride!"

They were a good six miles to the south of the fence. Already the road back home would have to be followed three parts in the dark.

Darred was the spokesman. "Frank, I'm going to call it a day.'

The others reined up with him, but the man ahead rode on. He didn't seem to hear. Darred lifted his voice. "Come on, call it a day, Frank. Tomorrow, maybe. But you see we've run it out and they're not here."

"Wait," said Frank over his shoulder, still riding on into the pocket.

White's mount—a mare—laid back her ears, shied, and stood trembling. After a moment she whinnied.

It was as if she had whinnied for a dozen. A crashing in the woods, above them to the left and the avalanche came—downstream, erupting, wheeling, wheeling away with volleying snorts, a dark rout.

Darred, reining his horse, began to shout, "Here they go this way, Frank!" But Frank was yelling, "Up here, boys! This way, quick!"

It was the same note, excited, feverish, disordered, breaking like a child's. When they neared him they saw he was off his horse, rifle in hand, and down on his knees to study the ground where the woods began. By the time they reached his animal the impetuous fellow had started up into the cover, his voice trailing, "Come on; spread out and come on!"

White spoke this time. "Be darned if I do!" He lifted a protesting hail, "Come back here, Frank! You're crazy! It's getting dark!"

It was Frank's own fault. They told him plainly to come back and he wouldn't listen.

For awhile they could hear his crackle in the mounting underbrush. Then that stopped, whether he had gone too far for their ears or whether he had come to a halt to give his own ears a chance . . . Once, off to his right, a little higher up under the low ceiling of the trees that darkened moment by moment with the rush of night, they heard another movement, another restlessness of leaves and stones. Then that was still, and everything was still.

Darred ran a sleeve over his face and swung down. "God alive, boys!"

It was the silence.

The first they heard was the shot. No voice. Just the one report. Then after five breaths of another silence a crashing of growth, a charge in the darkness under the withered scrub, continuous and diminishing.

They shouted, "Frank!" No answer. They called, "Frank Bluedge!"

Now, since they had to, they did. Keeping contact by word, and guided partly by directional memory (and mostly in the end by luck,) after a time they found the storekeeper in a brake of ferns, lying across his gun.

They got him down to the open, watching behind them all the while. Only then, by the flares of successive matches, under the noses of the snorting horses, did they look for the damage done.

They remembered the stillness and the gloom; it must have been quite black in there. The attack had come from behind—equine and pantherine at once, and planned and cunning. A deliberate lunge with a forefoot again: the shoe which had crushed the backbone between the shoulder blades was a forehoe, that much they saw by the match flares in the red wreck.

They took no longer getting home than they had to, but it was longer than they would have wished. With Frank across his own saddle, walking their horses and with one or another ahead to pick the road (it was going to rain, and even the stars were lost,) they made no more than a creeping speed.

None of them had much to say on the journey. Finding the break in the boundary fence and feeling through the last of the woods, the lights of their farms began to show in the pool of blackness below, and Darred uttered a part of what had lain in the minds of them all during the return:

"Well, that leaves Cam."

None followed it up. None cared to go any closer than he was to the real question.

It answered itself. Camden was at home when they got there.

He had come in a little before them, empty-handed. Empty-headed, too. When Blossom, who had waited all day, part of the time with neighbor women who had come in and part of the time alone to the point of going mad—when she saw him coming down the pasture, his feet stumbling and his shoulders dejected, her first feeling was relief. Her first words, however, were, "Did you get him, Cam?" And all he would answer was, "Gi' me something to eat, can't you? Gi' me a few hours' sleep, can't you? Then wait!"

Then he relapsed into his stupidity, and not even the arrival of the party bringing his brother's body seemed able to shake him so far clear of it again.

At first, when they had laid Frank on forth of his love. That terror was real; it had shaken her like an aspen leaf.

He demanded: "I asked, what's she done? I don't care to listen to falsehoods about her. Have you got any right to know where she is?"

Carter-Snowdon reddened at Dorn's nailing his lies, and unthinkingly admitted his lie by snapping. "I don't consider it's any of your affair, my man."

The domineering tone angered Dorn. He knew now that Carter-Snowdon's apparent friendliness at first was based on the belief that the mere utterance of his name would overawe a cartographer, and that a good-sized bribe in addition would settle the matter quickly and discreetly.

It was Dorn who flung down the gage of battle.

"In that case, it's none of your affair where she is. You've got some reason for wanting her, but it's the kind of reason that you're ashamed to tell a man face-to-face. Ashamed to let be known. Whatever it is, you're a jim-dandy—hounding a girl with your money and your hired snoopers till she's fear-stricken and near driven crazy. You're wasting your time here. If you won't come clean, I don't tell where she is; and you're going to have one heap-hell time finding out."

Soft-Shoe produced an automatic, stepped back a couple paces out of reach of a lunge, and covered Dorn.

Dorn was rather amused at this move. In a city alley Soft-Shoe might be a capable person, but in the bush he was a babe in the woods. With his own hidden automatic, shot from the hip, Dorn could have cut him down. But that was not at all necessary.

"Now, fellow," Carter-Snowdon demanded, "you're going to tell me where she is. I've wasted five days in these damned mountains already. If you won't talk, we'll take steps to make you talk. You had your chance to get a handsome sum, but you played the fool—the fool over her. I suppose it was a nice prospect—to have her somewhere and go visiting."

In the man's tone, more than by what he said, Dorn detected something new and startling—a smoldering, primitive jealousy. Unmistakable; it was stamped on his ponderous face and his thick lips and on his cheeks minutely veined with red.

Dorn perceived, he was forced to the conclusion, that the relation between Carter-Snowdon and Aurore was a personal one. Whatever other factors entered in, the man loved her, with a jealous, sensual love; for the mere thought of another man having her in his keeping unleashed the primitive brute.

What was that relation? Had Aurore been engaged to him and jumped the engagement? It would explain his jealousy, it might possibly explain her flight and his search for her. But it was repugnant to think of, and incredible; and more than that, it was flatly impossible. For Carter-Snowdon was married. In a batch of papers sent to him when he was abroad Dorn remembered reading about that marriage. And Aurore was not his wife. His wife was a girl from the Maritime Provinces, the daughter of a Cabinet Minister. An Edmonton paper had run a scorching editorial on making political capital out of sacred matrimony.

In his aching desire to find out what that relationship was, Dorn deliberately played upon his enemy's jealousy. With studied provocation: "Yes, it is a nice prospect—with her. You said it."

Carter-Snowdon flushed down to his collar.

"You—d'you think she'd have a nobody like you—even if she could? You damned fool, she's rich, well born, out of your class. She's using you. When she gets through with you she'll throw you out of the window like a banana skin!"

Even if she could. For a third time, that warning, that blunt statement! Dorn felt himself very near to Aurore's secret. Enraged a little more, Carter-Snowdon would blare it out.

It was Soft-Shoe, watching the drama with his fish-cold eyes, who saw Dorn's purpose and checked Carter-Snowdon from blurting out the ugly fact.

"Sir," he spoke up respectfully, "you shouldn't answer him. He's trying to learn from you what she's afraid to tell him. No use letting him know anything about it, sir. If you please, I'll take him in hand and he'll talk for me."

With no hope of getting any information from these men, Dorn no longer cared to bandy words with them. But before driving them away he proposed to put a little fear of the Lord into this pair. His blood was running hot.

But first the detective had to be disarmed. That looked like a suicidal attempt; the man was fully twelve feet distant, where he could shoot several times before Dorn could reach him, and his heavy black automatic, covering Dorn, did not waver.

Dorn looked at him fixedly for a moment. Then his eyes traveled to the bush just behind the detective and he made a slight motion with his hands, as though gesturing to some ally of his who was creeping up to get the drop.

Soft-Shoe saw the gesture and whirled around to face this supposed enemy. Dorn stooped, picked up a broken tent peg, flung it with all the power of his arm, and then lunged.

The hurtling missile caught Soft-Shoe across the chest. It staggered him, knocked the breath out of him. The next moment Dorn closed in, clutched his gun hand, held it up, and his right fist smashed into the detective's midriff with a sickening thump.

Soft-Shoe slumped against a sapling and doubled up on the ground.

Kicking the automatic aside, Dorn turned on Carter-Snowdon. He sized up his bigger enemy like a woodman the tree he intends to chop down. Those hands were big and meaty, those shoulders powerful; Carter-Snowdon was two inches taller and forty pounds heavier; but he carried an inch or two of fat under his belt, and he had the white skin of a person who takes his outdoor life with gloves on.

He took a solid blow to the face, but his right went smashing home to the jaw. It snapped back his enemy's head; dazed him. A left stab knocked Carter-Snowdon to his knees. With that remark still burning his ears Dorn struck him once more . . . a long-swinging right . . .

He stepped over, picked up the detective's automatic and came back.

Carter-Snowdon was still lying senseless on the moss.

CHAPTER XI

FOR several minutes Dorn and the detective worked with Carter-Snowdon before they brought him around. When his eyes did flicker open, Soft-Shoe plucked at Dorn's sleeve and walked aside. Curious, Dorn followed him.

"I'm fading out of this trick," the detective said curtly. "Don't cotton to't. I'm handling his men and drawing some royal long-green, but I don't give a gin-damn how much money's in it. I'm done."

"What do you mean—you're done?"

"Quitting cold on the job. I draw a line. This trick is a little on the off side. I'll keep tab on husbands for the alimony sisters, but damned if I'll help hunt down Miss McNain. I can't dope out why she done what she done, but she's a plucky little skirt. Everything he said against her, that was all hooey. I was about sick of the job before you put up that scrap. Now I'm burned out complete."

The man sounded sincere. But Dorn was wary, and scented a trap.

Late that evening, when Dorn had shaved, and dressed his batered knuckles, and eaten supper— a lonely meal after his breakfast with Aurore—he hailed a meti passing in a canoe and sent word for old Luke to come over and see him. While he waited he pondered the situation further. Their next step would be an attempt to capture him. He was quite safe from a bullet in the back, because he was the only mortal who knew where Aurore was, and they had to have that information. Soft-Shoe's words, "He'll talk for me," were ominous warning.

With a threat of torture facing him now, Dorn reasoned in hard, practical fashion: "By day, in the Silver Hawk, I can take care of myself. But I can't fly in the daytime and sit up with a rifle across my knees at night. I've got to sleep, and sleep relaxed. If old Luke is on guard out in the spruce shadows, they won't sneak past him; and I'll be safe at night. With a rifle and automatic apiece he and I could put up a wonderful argument. A dynamite fence—wires strung under the moss, this whole area around camp mined—that would help out wonderful too."

Old Luke came, much the better for a few hours' sleep. In the twilight the two of them sat down on the moss in front of the tent. Dorn was aware that he was taking a decisive step. To no other man on earth, excepting Kansas Eby, would he have intrusted the secret of Aurore McNain's whereabouts.

He said in the jargon: "Luke, up north two hundred miles on old Carrier trail is lake. Seven islands in that lake, and up above it is meadow where the foolish-bears" (mountain goats) "come to pasture." Drawing an imaginary map on the moss he pointed out where wilderness lake and island cabin were. "You kumtux place I mean, huh?"

"Before you born," old Luke said gravely. "I pitch tepee on island of big pines; hunt slam-slam the grizzly in those mountains."

"Kloshe, you know. Luke, you once took white man and young white girl to lake of seven islands. You remember girl, huh?"

"What name, her? In Bergelot's wawa it mean sunrise, huh?"

"Yes, Aurore—Aurore McNain."

"Do I remember young squaw-siche and her father . . . Five summers I go with them north to lake; he hunter, guide. I know her when she only this so-high; when she make pies out of mud and papoose-doll out of pine-cone and rag. Over danger place on trail I carry her in these arms."

Her father had died, Luke said. Old Bergelot had read that news to him out of a paper; and they had often talked of Aurore. But since that last trip they had lost track of her. Every Christmas time she sent them both a present—from Victoria, from Montreal, from New York. Beyond that she had dropped completely out of sight.

Dorn said: "Luke, this girl Aurore is living up at that lake now."

The old Indian started like a hit buck. "What? Living at lake? Huh!"

Dorn related how Bergelot had brought Aurore across to his tent the night she fled from the Transcontinental, and how he had flown her north to the lake, and about his Edmonton trip, and about her enemies who were closing in upon her.

When he finished, old Luke sat chewing meditatively on a sweet-birch twig. When he finally spoke, he talked at greater length than Dorn had ever before known him to. His former guardianship over Aurore, her return now after these years, seemed to have loosened the strings of his tongue. Finally he said in croaking guttural:

"I help. What matter I get killed? We are together in this fight."

When he awoke, the next morning Dorn found the air too thick and hazy for cartographing. After making old Luke go to sleep, he wrote by his flying log, boxed his precious films for shipment, and went over to the station. There he wired to Edmonton for a machine gun, and procured a box of gelatin dynamite from a prospector; and back at camp he fixed brackets in the plane cockpit to mount the gun, and planted a neat dynamite mine around his tent.

At noon he aroused old Luke and said: "I fly away now six, seven hours. S'pose you go scouting, find out where enemy camp is, how many men."

After Luke had gone, Dorn made up a bundle of things—the camera Aurore had asked for, a few camp articles she had overlooked, a moth-eaten bathing suit of his own, a couple of extra blankets for Aurore—and started westward from Titan Pass.

Sixty miles west of Titan Pass he let the Silver Hawk fly itself and turned and gazed back along his airy trail. In a moment or two he spotted a small shiny speck hanging in the sky. It grew no bigger, no smaller; but maintained a steady distance. A thousand feet lower than he, it kept dodging in and out of the clouds, taking advantage of them and of the mountains to hide from him.

Reaching out his binoculars, he drew the enemy ship up close. The machine was a big biplane equipped with pontoons—a slow and heavy craft. It might carry a couple of machine guns, but it could never get in range of his swift Silver Hawk.

When Dorn judged he had led his enemy far enough astray, he settled down to the job of shaking them off. Twenty minutes after he pushed the throttle wide open, the shining speck behind him dwindled to a pinpoint and vanished.

Two hours later he sighted the huge star-shaped glacier overlooking the Lake of the Dawn.

CHAPTER XII

WHILE Dorn was speeding toward his landmark the glacier, Aurore McNain was sitting on a rock at the west side of her island where the wolf-foot was was soft and velvety beneath her and where the sun beat down warm and golden and life-giving.

With thunderstorms rumbling in the mountains like distant battles drawing near, the afternoon was hot and sultry; and Aurore had gone swimming in the cool waters of the lake. Her hair flowed down from her shoulders and spread on the moss behind her; she was sitting pensive, her arms about her knees, watching out over the lake where a pair of band-tailed pigeons, graceful and rhythmic as a poem of motion, tilted and volleyed in their airy mating dance.

As she watched them there came a singing whine which seemed to come from nowhere and which grew steadily louder until, high above the glacier, she saw the Silver Hawk wing in between two heavy white clouds and then sail out into the unbroken blue above her.

As the airplane came spiralling down toward the island, Aurore stood up and waved. At three thousand feet the machine leveled off and flew in circles; and after a few moments of wonder Aurore understood that Dorn had seen her, in bathing suit, and was giving her opportunity to change clothes if she wanted to. She hesitated a little till she remembered he had said something about fetching a bathing outfit, and guessed he had brought it this time and might like to go swimming.

Hurrying across the island, she got a blanket at the cabin by way of dressing robe, and ran on to the cove. Dorn dropped down, taxied close in, and paddled ashore with a pack.

As they shook hands Aurore saw Dorn's quick disciplined glance at her throat and loosened hair, and noticed how he made himself look then at her eyes. He stooped and unbuckled the pack to show her what he had brought. She thought: "He knew I didn't need them so soon. They're an excuse—unless his work took him up near here." She saw his bathing suit and said: "If you'll go up to the cabin, Jim, I'll wait for you."

She watched till he had entered the door; then turning, she looked at the Silver Hawk, wondering just why Jim Dorn had come, and finally, slipping the blanket from her shoulders, she swam out to the airplane. Standing on a pontoon, she peeped into the cockpit. She saw some new brackets which Dorn had lately fixed against the sides for some purpose, but his big aerial camera was not there.

"He wasn't mapping. He came two hundred miles—a four-hundred-mile trip—for an hour with me." She repeated the words, "For an hour with me," and her eyes were frightened. There on the pontoon of his plane Aurore came to her decision. "I've got to tell him—before he leaves. I've got to —got to . . ."

She glanced fearfully at the cabin under the great pines, and she experienced a sudden wild impulse to run away and hide.

Aurore could swim like a young otter and floated so easily that Dorn half believed she could curl up on the water and go to sleep like an otter; and she dived so far that Dorn with an eye always alert on her, would hold his breath waiting for her to break surface.

music and erecting green arches over the road.

In spite of the slow means of travel and the fact that most of the supplies for Columbia were packed in from Stockton on mules, the town made a rapid growth, and in less than two years had several schools and churches, also various lodges, including the Masonic Order and Odd Fellows. Two weekly newspapers also flourished.

In 1854 the little city was swept with a fire which practically wiped it out, with a loss of half a million dollars, but by noon of the following day over thirty buildings were started and within two weeks over a hundred new buildings were completed, many of them fireproof, so that the ultimate result to the town was a newer and better appearance than before.

As early as 1849 there were stages from Stockton to Sonora, and John Shine says that in 1852 there was a fine stage route from Stockton to Columbia. The trip from Stockton to Columbia was fraught with danger from bandits, the roads rough and narrow. Stockton, which was then only a trading post, grew into a busy town, being as it was the gateway to the mining camps. Stages carried mail and gold dust as well as passengers, and the trip was full of excitement and thrills. The stages were advertised as "luxurious and speedy."

"'Twas a fine sight to see the stage leave," he recalled. "They had six horse teams—six blacks, six dapple grays and six buckskins with white tails. They changed horses every fifteen miles."

Mr. Shine owned the stage lines covering two hundred and seventy miles, and was a crack stage driver himself. I asked him if he was familiar with a picture which now hangs in the Yosemite stage office in Sonora, showing the stagecoach driving through the "Dead Giant" tree in Tuolumne Grove, the driver and men passengers wearing the fashionable beards of that time.

"Why, I paid a hundred and sixty-eight dollars to have that tree cut out," he said, "and had the picture taken. To this day they're still taking pictures of that tree. My stage route included the road from Stockton to Columbia, also the road to Yosemite and the one to Bodie, a hundred and twenty miles over the mountains. I was the first man 'Black Bart' ever held up," he added. "He didn't get anything, though. I gave him the wooden box and he took it. I guess he hadn't heard that the Wells Fargo had just started putting on steel boxes, which were carried inside." He chuckled as he remembered how he had fooled the noted bandit.

The stage trip from Stockton to Columbia required seven or eight hours, and the stage's arrival was the event of the day. One of Columbia's now-empty saloons still bears the legend, "Stage Drivers' Retreat."

"Were you ever shot at by robbers?" I asked Mr. Shine.

"I was shot at sixteen times by four of them, two miles from Columbia, but I saved the money, and this is what the Wells Fargo gave me," pulling proudly from his pocket a thick gold watch, and opening the case for me to read the inscription:

"Presented by Wells Fargo to J. H. Shine—For saving the treasure. November 15, 1876."

"Did you have much money along that time?" I asked him.

"Eight thousand dollars. There were four of the robbers. They hid in a little gulch, and two of them ran out and grabbed the front horses' heads. The other two leveled their guns at me, and I laid down flat on the seat and just let my team have their reins. My horses were pretty brisk, and we left the bandits standing there, but they fired sixteen shots at me, and a piece of the seat was shot from behind me and filled my neck full of splinters."

John Shine, who served in the Civil War, was made United States Marshal under McKinley in 1898 and reappointed under Roosevelt. His face lights up when he tells of the early days, when as a daring youth he drove stage for several years prior to owning the stage lines in and around Columbia.

Mr. Shine has owned his home in Sonora, five miles from Columbia, for fifty years, and it is not for sale.

at the landing when she spoke to him, pleading for a few minutes. He had heard a strange quaver in her voice. And now her attitude, as she leaned toward him, was the attitude, the trembling eagerness, of one poised for flight.

WITHOUT betraying that he noticed anything unusual, Dorn deliberately turned away from her, fumbling again in the chair. Old Bergelot was reached Aurore his chair. Old Bergelot was Dorn was amazed. Aurore's very assurance beat down any suspicion that she might be

Dorn heard old Bergelot thumping back up the path. Because he was standing face to face with Aurore under the torch, Dorn could not help noticing that her brown eyes were asking some question. Then she spoke it:

"Dad said I could—over here somewhere—I could change clothes . . ."

"Conserbere? My Oracious!—you can change in here if you will. You weren't thinking of going out in the dark, were you?"

Circling over Lake Titan, he climbed steadily till he was higher than the lofty dolomites crowning old Titan Major. Then with a glance at his compasses, a glance and reassuring smile over his shoulder, he straightened his direction out, pointed the throttle wide open, and roared away into the north, alone in the night sky with Aurore pair had been over there in the thick of things, and together they had entered the Canadian Air Force. Their assignments this season had separated the two of them temporarily; with four other birdmen Eby was stationed at Eagle Nest, two hundred miles east, while Dorn worked alone from his base here at Titan Pass. This Saturday evening Kansas had whipped across the mountains. To visit Dorn, he said; but Dorn knew better—the dance had brought him. Kansas was like that. Hopping two hundred miles to an affair where "hawk flew in and birdie flew out," was nothing in his estimation.

It was half an hour before midnight that Dorn suddenly heard his partner coming up the dark path. The dance was still on. He wondered what on earth had pried Kansas away from it.

Refilling his pipe, he remembered that the Transcontinental, eastbound to Alberta foothills and Edmonton, had gone past a short while ago. The train was a possible explanation.

As Kansas stooped through the flap-front of the tent and sat down on the cot without saying a word, Dorn looked at him sharply. Something had upset him. A frown wrinkled his forehead and he tapped a cigarette with nervous fingers.

Kansas was a year younger than Dorn, plumper of face, a man of altogether different stamp. Dorn liked him for his sunlit nature. His eyes were saucy and bold and dare-devilish. Of nondescript American blood, he was a most amazing mixture of iron-hearted courage and carefree gallantry. Once down in California Dorn had seen him, guiding a disabled plane to a perilous, dead-stick landing, lean out of the cockpit and yell "hoi-yoi" at a pretty girl. That was Kansas.

In the glow of his electric torch hanging from the ridgepole Dorn finally managed to meet Kansas's eyes.

"What's up?" he asked.

Kansas cleared his throat. For once he was unsmiling.

Abruptly, in utter seriousness, he broke out: "Jim, over at the station, fifteen or twenty minutes ago, I saw a—it must have been a ghost!"

Dorn relaxed, still interested, but slightly skeptical.

"It was a pretty ghost and a scared ghost," Kansas added. "Not the kind a fellow's afraid of, but the kind that's afraid of you. I thought maybe you, being acquainted around here, might help me figure it out."

"I'm not acquainted with any ghosts that I know of in these mountains," Dorn observed. "What was it you saw?"

"You remember when the Transcontinental rolled in, short time ago?"

Dorn nodded.

"Well, I was standing down at the west end of the platform just where the cedars begin. Fact, I was standing in their shadows. Happened to be alone. Was waiting for a 'breed—you know him, that bush-sneak, Joe Yoroslaf—to come out and settle a knuckle argument like he asked me, only he got cold feet when he found out I had an automatic too, and he didn't come. I wasn't ten, twelve yards from the tracks when the train stopped. Up front a bunch of people got off a minute or so to stretch their legs and buy trinkets but I was back at the Pullmans and private coaches.

"There was a girl, Jim—unless I was cock-eyed and 'seeing things'—a girl came out into the vestibule and down onto the steps and stood there a second in plain sight. I remember thinking when I first saw her, 'My word, there's a work of art!' She was about chin-high to you or me, about twenty, brown hair, a brown-eyed queen! She was dressed like a fashion-plate girl—traveling suit, a black cape trimmed with white fur, big silver buckles on the littlest pumps you ever saw, a diamond in her hair . . . Lord, Jim, her outfit 'ud cost you or me a whole summer's salary!"

Kansas paused a moment. It was seldom that he spoke seriously of girls. He liked them all and loved none. But he was serious now to the point of reverence.

He went on: "At first I thought she had just come out for a breath of air. But that was my mistake. If I know what 'scared' means, that girl was scared. It took me only half a split-wink to see she was. Jim, she hovered there on the steps with her hands up to her throat, her eyes wide, looking all around to be sure no one was watching her, before she jumped—"

Dorn stiffened a little in his chair and forgot to smoke. "Jumped? You mean she jumped off the train?"

"Jumped and lit running!" Kansas asseverated. "She flitted into the shadows like a . . . that cape she wore, streaming back from her shoulders . . . she damned near seemed to be flying, Jim! Once she got into the cedars where she couldn't be noticed she hid there on the other side of a laurel bush from me till the train picked up and went on.

"I stood there . . . Jim, I almost could have reached through that laurel and touched her . . . stood there, I did, like a wooden Indian, so absolutely thunderstruck I couldn't budge. It must have been two or three minutes before the train pulled out and my brain began hitting on all twelve again. Then I thought, 'Maybe she's in some trouble and I can give her a lift.' I made a noise so's not to surprise her, and ankled around that laurel clump.

"How she slipped away from me I don't know. It don't seem possible a girl could do it—neat as she did. I just saw one flutter of white—no sticks cracking, no leaves rustling—just that glimpse of white on deeper in the shadows, and she was gone. He looked at Dorn appealingly. The strain of flying sometimes played queer tricks with the best of pilots, and Kansas plainly had come to his partner for reassurance. Deliberate and philosophic, Dorn was always his anchor, his granite mountain.

Dorn took him firmly in hand: "Don't talk up that 'imagination' or it'll shoot your nerve. You saw a flesh-and-blood girl, of course. Your account does sound crazy, but there's some sane explanation to it. Are you sure she didn't get back into that coach without you seeing her?"

"I'm dead sure! Didn't I tell you she hid there arm's-reach from me all the time the train was pulling out?"

"She have any baggage?"

"Not a powder puff!"

"Anybody else get off?"

"Not a soul. I'd have heard if they had. A passenger's an event over there."

Dorn frowned. Except for a couple trifling points, such as seeing the color of a girl's eyes thirty feet away, he no longer had the slightest doubt that the incident had happened exactly as Kansas related it. And yet the whole thing seemed a little preposterous. Why should a city girl, without bag or baggage, evidently rich—why under heaven should she get off at a little mountain jump-down, at midnight, alone?

He knew the wilderness around there as he knew the lines of his palm. There were no mines thereabouts, no hunting lodges she could be bound for, no village within sixty miles—nothing but the tiny isolated cluster of a dozen cabins, a few Indian teepees, the H. B. store and a six-room hotel to which she had not gone.

On the very face of it Kansas was right about her being frightened of anyone seeing her. Otherwise she would have got off on the lighted platform. That was the queerest angle of the whole business—her flying into the shadows, hiding there, vanishing!

"What made her leave the Transcont, Jim?" Kansas demanded. "And so doggone furtive, and then run away from me like a flushed deer? And where'd she go to? There's a tough nut to crack: where could she have gone?"

"D'you suppose," Kansas queried, "that she's trying to get away from the—the Law, Jim?"

"Offhand I'd say no. A wilderness is the poorest possible place to hide in unless you're deep inside of it; and she, a girl like her, she couldn't foot-along a mile in these mountains. A big city, the bigger the better, would be the natural place she'd break for if she were trying to escape the Law. But how many people over there at the station did you tell about having seen her?"

"Nobody. I figured that only a close friend 'ud believe me. But why?"

"Well, you mentioned wanting to help her. Seems to me the best way to do just that is to keep quiet about her. It's none of our affair."

"You're right," Kansas agreed. "Dead right. I won't tell a soul. But I'd sure give a leg—I'd give both legs!—to know what's back of—Jim, if you'd only seen her as she stood on those steps, and then flew into the shadows and flitted away from me like a scared ghost! . . . Lord, she's over there now, somewhere, hiding!"

Dorn merely nodded, his face a mask. He had already decided, in his quiet, deep-thinking way, that when the dance ended he would go over there and talk to old Luke Illewahwacet and set the trusty old Indian like a bloodhound on the girl's trail. He had no intentions of intruding or being officious with offers of help. Her business was her business.

But if she was hiding out in the bush around there, someone ought to keep a watch over her. Most of the men at Titan Pass were clean-souled fellows, but three or four of them—men of a kidney with Joe Yoroslaf—were bush-sneak ruffians. If they should come upon a white girl, alone, unprotected . . . they had lonely trapping shacks in the inaccessible ranges.

CHAPTER II

AT MIDNIGHT Kansas rose and put on his flying togs for the flight home to Eagle Nest. With a flashlight Dorn went with him out to his plane. Back ashore he saw the machine take off and watched till the rope of flame spewing from the exhaust spiralled to a safe height and vanished over the peak-line of the Eastern Titans.

Forty yards out on the water his Silver Hawk, a specially built monoplane, with automatic photographing instruments, lay asleep at its moorings where two huge boulders protected it when storms woke up the lake. A glory of plane construction, it was Dorn's pride, and he groomed it with his own hands. Because of its powerful engine it was the swiftest pontoon plane in three provinces; and equipped with supercharger, it had a ceiling so high that he could soar above the deadly air chasms of his dangerous territory and film a wide expanse of wilderness at one sweep.

While Dorn waited there in the black shadows, intending to go over and see that the strange girl did not meet mishap, a call came wavering across the moonlit waters of Lake Titan. Low and cautious, it hardly rose above the drowsy murmur of the night.

Dorn straightened up, alert. The sound was so low and guarded that he could not even be sure it had been a human voice; but it snapped his chain of thought and he listened intently. A second time the call came wavering. No mistaking it—a human voice, his name.

He cupped his hands. "Hello! What's the trouble?"

From the southeastern shore, over toward the station, the answer came back like a muffled echo.

"Vous la - behers . . . alone . . . M'sieu Jeem? I am rowing to you . . ."

Dorn recognised the voice of kindly old Pere Bergelot. As he answered the hail, he smiled. A hundred miles south at Canoe, Bergelot had an aged sister whom he had not visited in years. No railroad led there; the trip afoot was too arduous for a man of sixty-eight. Tomorrow being Sunday, Dorn had offered to fly him down there for a few hours. He believed now that old Bergelot was over-eager, like a child who gets up and dresses before daylight on "visiting day."

Out on the water, beyond his monoplane he presently saw a creeping mottle of dark shadow and the moonlight glistening on wet oar-blades. Gradually the mottle sharpened into a boat and two blurred occupants.

It was probably old Bergelot, rowing, but who was that second figure sitting in the stern?

Innocently Dorn snapped on his flashlight to guide them in.

Bergelot's voice, guarded and husky, startled him.

"M'sieu Jeem! Keep dark! I can feel in to landing."

Dorn was astonished. The warning meant—it could mean nothing else—that Bergelot was afraid that other people, over at the station, might see the glimmer. He guessed that all this secrecy was somehow bound up with that second person, for old Bergelot's life and doings had no dark corners to them.

When the boat rubbed against his own he reached down and pulled it alongside on the landing. Old Bergelot rose up creakily and got out beside him. The other person, rising, too, stepped up into the prow and stood there and Dorn was face to face with a girl. In a flash he realized that here was "the brown-eyed queen" who had upset Kansas Eby's world!

"M'sieu Jeem," old Bergelot finally stumbled into speech, "I have brought to see you Mam'selle—Mam'selle—"

Into his rusty speech thick with the burr of the North broke a low golden voice, catching up his hesitant words.

"McNain. Aurore McNain. I hope we didn't awake or bother—"

Her name was strange to Dorn, and certainly he had never heard that voice.

"I'm James Dorn," he introduced himself, and somehow in spite of the darkness they found each other's hand directly, and Dorn noticed in that brief, formal clasp how slender and yet how firm her fingers were. "You didn't awake me. I was studying."

Old Bergelot rumbled again. "It was to me, M'sieu Jeem that Mam'selle Aurore came with her trouble. But I . . . old bones and chilly blood . . . I was helpless to help. I sat fearful for her till I thought of you. I said, 'Aurore, fille, there is a man like a sword,' and after much talking I persuaded her to let me bring her—"

Again the girl's low golden voice broke into Bergelot's hesitant French.

"Can't I speak to you, Mr. Dorn—just a few minutes—and explain why I came? When you understand . . . I know how busy you are with important work . . . but what I'm asking will take only a few hours, and Dad Bergelot said he would—he thought you would—"

Dorn understood that this girl wanted to ask a service of him. He noted also her reluctance in begging favor from a stranger—as though some hard necessity had driven her to it. Taking the lead into his own hands, he interrupted her.

"Hadn't you better come up to my tent; we can talk there. If you'll let me guide you—the path isn't much. Dad, go ahead."

He helped her step out upon the slippery rocks. His hand on her arm, he started up the trail, shielding her from brush swishing back. A few yards inland where its glimmer was screened from any eyes that might be watching, he snapped on the torch again, shooting it down at the path so that Aurore could see to walk.

In the tapering yellow circle of light he saw a pair of white-and-black slippers with silver buckles, and the flash of silken hose and the flutter of a short skirt. He was tempted to turn the torch upward and see what manner of girl she was; but he put down the impulse.

As he led her back toward the tent, Dorn sketched in, swiftly and summarily, what she had done from the time she got off the Transcontinental up to the present moment. When she flitted away from Kansas in the cedar shadows she had gone to Bergelot's cabin and waited there until he came from the dance. She was acquainted, well acquainted, with the old Indian hunter.

Unable to help her himself, Bergelot had brought her across to the island. It was a good guess that her seeking help from a stranger was due to the fact that the stranger, so to speak, had wings.

Aurore McNain came into the shaft of brilliant light streaming through the flap-front and Dorn had a full-length glance at her, though her features were shadowed; and for an astonished second he felt like Kansas and his wooden Hiwada.

She was dressed exactly as Kansas had described her. Her traveling suit, neat, belted, was rich and ultra-fashionable. She had flung back from her shoulders a black-velvet mantilla trimmed with white fur. She was bareheaded. Her single ornament, a barrette-like thing, subduing an unruly wave of her hair, shot rainbow fires from a cluster of small stones and a big center diamond.

The sight of her in that shaft of light hit Dorn like a boulder avalanche. No wonder she had completely upset Kansas Eby's world! Once again, even though he knew that within a few minutes he would be listening to her trouble, the question volted across Dorn's mind: What was she doing here, a girl dressed like that, here in the heart of this Rocky wilderness, at Titan Pass, at midnight, on a little spruce island out in a lake?

She was manifestly rich. Her clothes certainly stamped her as coming from some big city and being society-polished. But Dorn had the distinct impression that beneath the veneer this girl was wilderness-born and bred. He had first got that impression from his partner's story. Kansas was no slouch in the bush, yet Aurore had slipped away from him like an Indian's shadow. And coming up the rocky, root-snagged path, he himself had noticed little trail-wise acts of hers that made him seem clumsy-footed in comparison.

Across the glow of the torch he met Aurore's eyes. They were brown—imperious, dark-brown eyes that caught and held him, and for a moment he was unaware of everything else. Then he saw that her un-bobbed hair was a warm brown that shimmered richly under the light. Her features were clear-cut as a cameo, hers was an aggressive little chin; but her face was an exquisite oval in outline, her eyelashes long and dreamy, and there were dimples in her cheeks.

She was slender of body, but her limbs were rounded and her bosom was full. Dorn knew there was muscle, firm and vigorous, beneath the soft lines of her shoulders and arms. She was younger than he, twenty or perhaps twenty-one, but he felt himself in the presence of a mature personality.

Dorn noticed too, that she was trying to hide her emotion. One small brown fist was clenched till the knuckles were white. Down

Bolt-Shoe evidently admired him for being sensible, that is, for having a price; and he became a little more communicative.

"I can't say definite how much. But I can get in touch with the party that can. OK. Don't plead. "You were going to ask the police. I'll be helped in his affair, too. Then he can outfit—"

"I sent your telegram and brought your wardly compromising between clothes and girl.

Aurore laughed gaily. "Come, let's go tramping; I'll be guide. I oughtn't to have strutted and made you perjure yourself. But do you think 'they'll do'?"

Her question was a thrust at him for his callous remark down in his tent that first night. She was laughing at his embarrassment; she thought she had scored.

In his deliberate way Dorn caught her pointed arrow and returned it to her. "Step back a couple feet," he requested; and when Aurore obeyed, wondering, he drawled: "Yes, they'll do—do fine. But d'you know, on that limb above you now—if that isn't mistletoe I never saw any, and you—girl, you're standing square under it!"

Aurore glanced up. Her pretty lips parted in a gasp. She turned in confusion and fled from him.

At the south end of the island they sampled the white strawberries, but found them tart and unripe. In the open plots they tramped through patches of bluebells and larkspur and moccasin flowers, and saw an old lynx wallow in a bed of evil-smelling valerian.

Aurore had told him, when he caught up with her after she fled: "This island covers only ten acres, Jim, but it's got marvels enough to last a lifetime, and here you'll find our whole northland in miniature."

As she led him on and on through the mossy wildwood Dorn was amazed at her precise knowledge of bird and animal and plant. He asked her where she had learned her wood lore and she replied:

"Down at Titan Pass there's an old Indian, an old Mountain Beaver. He was our guide when Dad and I came here. He taught me." She laughed. "I guess he caught me young, Jim; I guess he wanted to make me into a regular Indian—"

"Old Luke!" Dorn interrupted. "Luke Illewahwacet! Old Few-of-Words. That's who you mean?" And when Aurore nodded, Dorn had a sudden thought: "I can trust old Luke with the secret of Aurore being here again. If I need help he'll be an ally. And a good one!"

Long afterward Dorn remembered that tramp with Aurore as the four happiest hours of his life. This was the season of the year—this Moon-of-the-Brown-Eagle-Mating—which had been the most precious memory of his long exile. Aurore had power to charm away the blue devils haunting his bleak background. She was a fire to warm his hands at. In moments of introspection he wondered whether life with Aurore McNain—intimate and long-continued—would change him and teach him happiness.

But old Bergelot's "Can never" rose between him and the prospect. Several times during their tramp Dorn suspected that Aurore had a secret purpose in leading him on and on through her wildwood. He wondered if it was not because she wanted to avoid the "long talk" she had promised him.

When they started back toward the cabin, and when she said, "There's one thing more, Jim, I want you to see," he knew that she was staving off, to the moment of his leaving, any talk about herself, her trouble, and what she had fled from.

Fifty paces inland on the west side of the island a diminutive spring welled up and cut a three-inch channel down through the moss to join the lake. It sparkled and purled over its granite pebbles and cascaded down its four-inch overfalls with a sound as sharp and clear as the tinkle of glass ocelila. From the lake edge Aurore led Dorn up toward the spring, making him creep the last few yards on hands and knees. He wondered what all the caution was about. As they lay on either side of the streamlet and looked into the crystal basin, he saw what.

A tiny trout, no longer than Aurore's little finger, had forged his way "up-river" past all those tremendous overfalls and rapids, and had pre-empted that spring as his habitation. He saw an incautious move of Dorn's, and darted to haven under a bracken frond. Presently when they lay very still he came out again, lordly as a great bass in a lake, and sailed serenely around his domain—master and over lord of all the wrigglers and pollywogs and elfthings of the tiny pool.

Aurore glanced across the basin, and her brown eyes were laughing. "Isn't he cute, Jim? He's a baby rainbow. I feed him a couple mosquitoes every morning. Look at him strutting, Jim? Majesty will be majesty—even in a hatful of water!" She added in a moment, "Shall we go on?"

"No. I've got to be leaving in a little while."

He noticed Aurore start, and he knew she realized he wanted to have at least a few minutes' talk with her before he left. She looked away from him and plucked abstractedly at the wolf-feet of the moss.

It was plain to him—watching her, studying her face—that she knew she ought to tell him now about her trouble, and yet was shrinking back from it. At last he said gently: "I know what you're thinking about, Aurore. You would rather not tell. I don't care to lie; of course I'd like to know. But that is wholly up to you. You must have a good reason for keeping it—"

"Yes, I do have good reason. And it's not that you'd stop running here and looking after me if you knew. You'd never do that. You'd see this through."

"Then what is your reason?"

Aurore answered without looking up: "I'll tell you, Jim: I want—I want to keep your respect as long as I can."

"To keep my respect!" He was so startled by the bitterness of her low golden voice that for a moment the meaning of her words was lost on him. Then he realized that Aurore was touching upon the thing which old Bergelot had warned him about. She was accusing herself of something which was justification, source, and reason, of that "Can never."

He looked at her steadily a few seconds, and said sharply, "I don't believe that!"

The tears suddenly sprang into her eyes; and Dorn knew that his words of faith in her, beating down her own assertion, had overwhelmed her.

He arose and knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and gave Aurore his hand to rise. "Will you go along with me to the cove? I have to leave now."

They walked together under the great pines to the other side of the island. As Dorn pulled on his gauntlets, he said to her: "I want to say just one thing, Aurore, and then we'll not recur to this matter again—until you want to. What you told me, about losing my respect—I don't believe that. The mere fact that you had the bravery and the honesty to say it, proves it isn't true."

But Aurore would not have it so. She said bitterly: "I'm sorry you think that, Jim. You—you have an awakening ahead of you." And she turned away and left him.

CHAPTER X

DORN dropped down upon Titan Pass from the west. It was not wisdom to come out of the north and betray the direction of Aurore's refuge to any suspicious eyes that might be watching the Silver Hawk.

Skimming low over the Western Titans he banked twice above his island, lit, and taxied in to the mooring between the boulders.

Old Luke Illewahwacet was waiting for him at the water's edge. Dorn took out his billfold and paid old Luke for his faithful watching. From the haggard look of the old Indian's eyes he knew Luke had "slept on foot" those four days and nights.

And as the old man stepped into his birch-rind canoe to go home he jerked a thumb over his shoulder toward the tent.

"Two men . . . they say they good tillicums to you . . . they waiting there."

"Friends of mine?" Dorn asked, suspicious. "Who are they?"

"Un't know," Luke grunted, shoving off. "One man he look like hiyu chief; big somebody him."

Two men. That was no terrific odds, if they were enemies.

Dorn slipped his automatic from jacket pocket into the pocket of his leather windsplitter where it would be handy, and started up the path to his tent.

Two men came out to meet him. At sight of them Dorn's eyes hardened and his fingers tightened upon the automatic. One of the men was Soft-Shoe.

The other . . .

Dorn looked at him steadily as the pair confronted him, and he realized that not only had his enemies tracked him down, but that here he was face to face with his chief foe—the embodiment of the power and the money and the purpose behind this hunt for Aurore McNain.

Vaguely Dorn remembered having seen a newspaper picture of this man confronting him, but he could not recall where or in what connection. In his cool estimate of his enemy there was something of admiration. This big stranger was at least a human being, susceptible to emotion; not a cold-blooded alley-wolf like Soft-Shoe.

The latter stood a respectful pace to one side of his chief. His jaw was bandaged where Dorn's knuckles had laid it open.

"You're Dorn the cartographer," the big stranger stated. "My name is Carter-Snowdon." He reached out his hand, and his clasp seemed friendly enough.

The name was all Dorn needed to place him. It awoke a score of memories. In his grander days he had worked in a Carter-Snowdon shingle factory and had bummed many a ride on "C-S" narrow gauge railways. Here was the man whom hundreds of straw bosses walked in fear and trembling of.

Dorn thought: "He's the H.C-S. that Aurore sent her message to. It's his power and his money that's behind this hunt for her."

Carter-Snowdon went on: "You escaped from Edmonton rather cleverly. But my man here remembered seeing a news picture of you. Some airplane rescue down in the Lillooets, I believe. He searched through back files in the library and identified you by that means."

Dorn knew it was a reference to the morning when Kansas had crashed on a mesa and he had made a parachute jump and pulled Kansas from the wreckage before the gas tank exploded. A news plane had come out from Victoria and taken pictures of that wreck, and the papers had played up the story.

"I presume you know why I came to see you, Dorn."

Though there was a noticeable condescension in Carter-Snowdon's tones, he spoke quietly, decently. He seemed to want a peaceful settlement. At any rate he had not brought along a squad of policemen or tried to force negotiations at the muzzle of an automatic. Dorn thought for a moment before he replied. He wanted to answer decency with decency. All the king's proverbial horses and men could not swerve him from his sense of fair play.

He thought: "Maybe I can come to an understanding with Carter-Snowdon. Maybe I can smooth out Aurore's troubles for her."

He answered: "You want to know where Miss McNain is. She came to me for help. Under the circumstances I gave her help. I have reasons to believe she did nothing illegal. If you can prove to me you've got a right to know where she is, I'm ready to talk to you."

His words caught Carter-Snowdon by surprise; he whirled on Soft-Shoe.

"I thought you told me this fellow knew all about her—"

"I didn't pry into her trouble," Dorn interrupted, nettled by "this fellow." "Since she's a girl I gave her the benefit of the doubt. But I'm giving you also a chance to put up your side of it."

"You're giving me a chance." Carter-Snowdon was half-amused at the words—at the equality implied by them. Then he sobered: "She's my ward. Our families were connected some years back. When her father died, I took her over."

"You say she's your ward. Then you can explain what made her pitch off as she did."

Carter-Snowdon thought for a moment, Dorn watching him. "I rather believe it is just a cheap bid for notoriety. She plans to stay out of sight awhile, then come back with some sensational story: kidnaped, held prisoner by the Indians—some narrative of that sort. It's been done before. She's young, flighty; inclined to ape others. You understand I don't want anything like this connected with my name."

Dorn knew the explanation was a lie from start to finish. Vividly he remembered Aurore's fear when she stood under the electric and another for the governed. The human element never seemed to occur to them. They were much concerned about the enforcement of property rights, and little concerned about human rights, other than their own.

Under the former regime, when the laborers were bound to the land, virtually owned by the owners of the estates, they represented a property right, a part of the assets of the hacienda, and they received the same care as the machinery and the mules. But the property right had been lost, alike to the owner and the peons.

During this period the owners and managers of the estates were careful about the machinery and its feeding with proper fuel, for a property right was involved. They were solicitous about the care and feeding of their mules, again a property right. If a mule became incapacitated, the owner must bear the cost of replacement; but, if a peon dropped in the harness, two others were waiting at the gates of the haciendas to replace him, and without additional cost.

A foreman who was remiss in the proper care and feeding of the live stock was discharged, but he was never called upon, either by the owner or the local or Federal government, for overworking and undernourishing the peons.

I have seen a foreman on a cold night give to the peons blankets to cover the mules, but never a blanket for the shivering peon. He was fortunate if he was able to steal out in the blue night, snuggle up to the mule and share a part of its blanket.

The injustice of the intellectuals in Mexico for generations had cried out to heaven for they were not ignorant of the precincts of justice. Not all of them were so heartless. Some have protested that there were model haciendas, where human rights received equal consideration with property rights, but I never encountered one, and know from my own experience that they were rare.

When the revoluntionary movement began the plight of the laborer on the Church and hacienda lands and in many of the mines and industries was worse than the condition under human slavery.

But the time came when the sins of the fathers were visited on the sons. The innocent and guilty suffered alike in the first transports of outraged justice. Fortunate were they who were able to flee from the wrath that came, to escape across the border.

Cruelty breeds cruelty; injustice breeds injustice; then the avenger comes.

We of the United States know that, during the twenty years of Mexican revolution, the policy alike of our government and our people has been directed toward aiding the Mexican people in their aspiration for self government and equality of opportunity; that we have never even dreamed of annexing a foot of Mexican soil, of robbing the Mexican people of any national resource, or exploiting Mexico for our economic advantage. Our sole and single purpose has been to help the Mexican people to help themselves to better living conditions, to remedy the unfortunate condition under which the Mexican land is rich and the people poor.

But the good intentions of one people are not always understood by another. Tolstoi once wrote that "Patriotism is a love that hates." Patriotism, love of country, has nearly always taken in Europe and Latin America the form of hatred of a neighboring people. And hatred is often the involuntary tribute that the weak pay to the strong. We have not been without fault, for we have at times made our assumed superiority in education and culture too evident. President Wilson meant the best for Mexico, but he found only hatred where he expected gratitude, because his proffers of assistance were made with what the Mexicans interpreted as a patronizing gesture.

Let us place ourselves for a moment in the position of the Mexican masses. They know that the territory that now forms Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California once belonged to Mexico. And when admonition smacking of intervention or interference comes from north of the Rio Grande they ask each other "When is the northern colossus coming to take the rest?"

Mexico has fought her own revolution in her own way. Children have grown to middle age in a period of violence and misery. But there are unmistakable evidences that their sacrifices have not been in vain. When a father and mother have seen their sons going away to the wars they have asked "Why must they go? What is it all about?" When a peaceful valley or plateau has been invaded, they have asked "Why?" The desire for knowledge has prepared the soil for the present educational movement. They are beginning to consolidate in peace what was won in blood and travail. According to the government reports 47 per cent of all the money raised in taxes and duties in 1929 went for education. Education is the light that is penetrating the shadows that gathered through seven centuries of servitude.

In succeeding articles I shall discuss different phases of the Mexican revolution. I shall speak of the leaders who rose to temporary prominence, only to be struck down by lead or steel. They gave their lives to the revolution, and I shall strive to find a modicum of good in them all.

at the landing when she spoke to him, pleading for a few minutes, he had heard a strange quaver in her voice. And now her attitude, as she leaned toward him, was the attitude, the trembling eagerness, of one poised for flight.

CHAPTER III

WITHOUT betraying that he noticed anything unusual Dorn courteously reached Aurore his chair. Old Bergelot was rumbling again.

"M'sieu Jeem, you were planning to take me away tomorrow at the point of day. But that was but a visit, which I can forego when something more pressing . . . If you . . . This trouble of Mam'selle Aurore's . . . A few hours' flight in your swift machine of the air . . ."

Dorn scarcely heard the hesitant words. He was looking at Aurore, and she at him; and in their community of youth, swift and energetic, old Bergelot could have no role.

"It's good of you, Dad," he said, "if Miss McNain's trouble is more urgent. Won't you sit down, Miss McNain. I'll sit here on the cot. You wanted to ask something, I believe."

As he listened to Aurore, watching her pretty lips move, meeting her brown eyes once, Dorn marvelled at the briefness of her account. It was swift as a fluted arrow.

"My father is up in the headwaters of the Carrot, Mr. Dorn, a hundred miles south of the Lost River Dutchman's post. He's been in that region three summers, tracing a chromite float that is rich in platinum. In his last message out he mentioned that four bush sneaks were shadowing him and he was keeping close to camp.

"I don't know what's happened. His cabin is on a little island. They probably wouldn't attack him there. But if they're waylaying the passes he can't come out afoot. Over the trail it's more than a two week's trip to the lake, but I thought, in a plane . . . ." She did not put her request into words, but it was more evident than if she had.

Dorn did not answer immediately. Aurore's story sounded a little odd in his ears. It did not quite explain why she should get off the Transcontinental so secretly or why she had guarded against anyone seeing her. And her father's predicament, somewhat dangerous, true enough, did not seem to justify her trembling fright.

"You're not mistaken about the region?" he asked, unwilling openly to doubt a girl, yet suspecting that she was not telling him all. "The reason I'm asking—I never heard of any rich mineral in the headwaters of the Carrot, and I used to prospect a bit and hear most of the rumors. That's why that territory is so wild and untravelled."

"But I'm certain where he is, Mr. Dorn."

Aurore plainly did not see that he was probing, so Dorn asked another question: "How did your father ever manage to get a message out to you?"

"By Indian runner. Moccasin telegraph." Possible, Dorn thought. Some of those mountain carriers could cover astounding distances in a short time.

"How many are in your father's party?" he further inquired.

"No one. He's alone."

It seemed very, very strange, that the father of a girl so manifestly rich as Aurore McNain should go prospecting at all, and even stranger that he should not take a well-equipped party.

Maybe her father was a prospector and maybe he wasn't. Maybe he was hunting for platinum, and maybe . . . The thought flashed across Dorn's mind that that up-country wilderness was a superlative place for a man to hide in.

He harbored that possibility for a moment, then brushed it aside, knowing it was wrong. So he asked no more questions, but came quickly to his decision.

"You want me to find your dad and bring him out. I'll try to." And when he saw the fervent "Thank you!" on her lips and the wordless gratitude of her brown eyes, he tersely added: "It's part of our instructions to aid the Mounted and Provincial Police in any way we can. Since this is a matter they'd ordinarily attend to, I'm doing you no favor at all, please. Can you tell me where he's camped? I've charted the Carrot headwaters—it was my first assignment—and I've got the check maps. Maybe your dad gave you some details."

Aurore caught at his suggestion. "Yes, he did. I can point out the exact place."

Dorn was skeptical. In that wide-flung wilderness stretching northward it was hard enough to locate a mountain range, let alone a cabin site. And for a girl to do it, on stray hints her father had dropped . . . the most he hoped for was a general idea of where to look. But he got up and sorted out several charts and spread them on the table in a "mosaic." Aurore bent over them beside him, so close that he caught the perfume of her hair and a stray wisp of it brushed his cheek.

"Nothing is named yet," Dorn explained. "Just the water systems and glaciers and mountains put down. But here—to give you your bearings—down here is Titan Pass and the railroad."

Aurore's finger began moving carefully up across the map. With astonishing accuracy she followed an old Carrier trail which Luke Illewahwacet had told Dorn about; followed its tortuous route up across the ranges, through river canyons, over watersheds and snowy passes, on into the north two hundred miles till her finger stopped at a lake—a mere splash of blue hemmed in by the burr of a formidable horseshoe range.

"There!"

Dorn was amazed. Aurore's very assurance beat down any suspicion that she might be guessing.

"Gracious!" he exclaimed, in surprise, in admiration, but still vividly aware, though she was not, of that wisp of hair against his cheek. "If you'd been over the trail afoot, if you'd lived there at that lake, you couldn't have done a better, quicker job of locating it, Miss McNain!"

He could not understand why Aurore gasped at his innocent words and why she drew a little away from him.

After a moment she placed her slender finger again on the map, and asked, "Can you find your way to the lake, Mr. Dorn?"

Studying a few seconds, Dorn called back to mind that neighboring horseshoe range. Gradually he revisioned the lake itself—a deep blue gem of water six miles long and two wide, with seven little wildwood islands in the center and pines all around its shore like the lashes around a girl's eye.

He had winged out over that water in the splendor of a glorious morning; and fearful that his beautiful discovery might be named after some cabinet minister or politician, he had arbitrarily entered it in his log as "Lake of the Dawn." The region for leagues all around it was the wildest of his whole cartographing territory. The few prospectors who had penetrated it had come out awed and dismayed by its huge, elemental loneliness.

Aurore glanced across the basin and her brown eyes were dancing.

"I can find the lake all right," he remarked, as he and Aurore straightened up, facing each other. "But how about the cabin—can you tell me where to look for it?"

"It would be hard to tell you. But I can point it out easily enough when we're over the lake."

"We! And because the idea was so startling and so utterly unexpected, he repeated: "We! Are you going along?"

"I'd like to," Aurore said quietly, but with that trembling anxiety latent in her voice. "Is it so very foolish to want to have a part in rescuing—"

"No, but . . . but . . ." Dorn was trying to adjust himself to this new turn and see what he could make of it. "But there's no good reason for your going. I can find any cabin on those little islands. And it'd be exposing you to danger. Besides, my plane's only a two-seater."

"We can be there by daybreak when the valley will still be filled with shadow up to timber-line level, Mr. Dorn. I mean, those breeds will be asleep, and we can alight and then come away quickly, and there'll be no danger. And couldn't two people on the return trip ride in one seat somehow?"

Dorn did not oppose her further; he had found out what he wished to know. He was thinking swiftly: "She's hiding something; what she didn't tell me is more important than what she did say. This father story sounds considerably odd."

Then he said: "All right. Let's be on our way. But you, in those . . ." He was looking at Aurore's bare throat and thinly clad body, and thinking of zero air whistling past the cockpit at more than one hundred miles an hour—"in those clothes you'd freeze. Maybe I can rake something together."

But he could not even imagine Aurore clad in any garments of his. Her head came barely to the level of his chin, and in one of his great coats he would have to hunt for her.

Old Bergelot got up and went out of the tent not saying a word. Aurore explained: "He's going after my bundle of things in the boat. I mean, they're not mine exactly; some trapper left a bag at the station, and Dad said they'd do for me."

So she hadn't even brought clothes! Kansas had told the truth there again. She had flung away with nothing but what she stood in now. Possibly she had been so anxious about her father that she never stopped to think of baggage. Possibly!

While they waited there, alone together for the first time, he saw that Aurore was weighing him—taking his measure as a man, instead of blindly accepting old Bergelot's high praise. It seemed to him there was a certain cold, hard suspicion in her eyes. Not of him in particular, but of men in general. She had yielded reluctantly to the notion of coming to him, a strange man, with her trouble, and she was not altogether sure that she had done right.

They heard old Bergelot thumping back up the path. Because he was standing face to face with Aurore under the torch, Dorn could not help noticing that her brown eyes were asking some question. Then she spoke it:

"Dad said I could—over here somewhere—I could change clothes . . ."

"Somewhere? My gracious!—you can change in here if you will. You weren't thinking of going out in the dark, were you?"

For the first time Aurore smiled—a bewitching, girlish smile. She flushed slightly under his sharp glance and looked down.

"No-oo," with her exquisite lips rounded; "not seriously, I didn't expect I'd have to."

Old Bergelot returned with the clothes. Dorn laid them on the cot and spread a coat of his on the ground for Aurore to stand on. Before going out he untied the furl rope and let the tent sides down so that she could dress in strict privacy.

CHAPTER IV

IN THE boat, with old Bergelot rowing, Dorn went out to the Silver Hawk, swung its nose toward the open lake, stripped the canvas off the cockpit, and pumped a drum of gasoline into the tanks.

Back ashore, waiting for Aurore to dress, he asked a few questions of Bergelot.

"You seem to have known Mam'selle Aurore before tonight, is it true?"

"Ou' "—A single grunt from the darkness.

"I suppose Mam'selle Aurore—she is bush-wise as an Indian—that she must have gone with her father much on the mountain trail, is it true?"

Again the single grunt. Bergelot plainly did not want to talk about her. Dorn felt that to question him further would be prying into something not his business. So he walked up the path to his tent and outside the flap he cracked a stick. Aurore recognized his method of knocking and bade him come in.

Aurore finished and stood up.

"I'm ready, if you are. Will these clothes . . . I've never been up in a plane before."

She had put on a khaki skirt, belted jacket, heavy wool stockings, and Alpine shoes. Dorn surveyed her, then remarked, "They'll do, I guess. But they'll need additions. Here"—he reached down his spare helmet from the ridge pole—"this'll help. That strap goes 'round behind; this one buckles under the chin. . . ."

"Maybe you'd better," she suggested, tilting up her head and holding very still.

His fingers were clumsy with the buckle under Aurore's chin. She stood very still and patient, looking up at him with a glance as candid and innocent as a child's. In that close intimacy Dorn noticed that her face was a little thin and wan. There were telltale lines under her eyes, and their lashes drooped heavily. She was tired, poor girl—desperately tired. Only her purpose and the flush of excitement kept her going.

He finished with the helmet. "Now goggles . . ."

There was presently nothing left of Aurore's face except nose and winsome mouth and that small aggressive chin. Dorn slipped an automatic revolver into her jacket pocket, saw that his rifle was loaded and in working order; then drew on his own leather coveralls with lynx-fur collar, belted at the ankles and waist and buttoning diagonally up to the shoulder.

Catching up gauntlets and rifle, he snapped off the electric torch and in the darkness felt Aurore's hand on his arm. They went down the path together to the landing where old Bergelot rowed them out to the Silver Hawk. Standing on a pontoon, Dorn lifted Aurore into the rear seat, tucked a wire-weave blanket about her, and snapped her safety belt. Very carefully he adjusted the straps of the parachute over her shoulders, across her breast, and around her waist. He told her that she was sitting on a "Guardian Angel"; and he explained—making a joke of the matter, as he and his brother birdmen always did with passengers—how in case of emergency she should jump clear, count four and jerk the ripcord.

For a hundred yards or so the plane taxied over the water like a swan taking wing; then began knocking the tops off the gentle wavelets. Dorn swerved it up lake, gave it the gun; it leaped into the air and rose.

Circling over Lake Titan, he climbed steadily till he was higher than the lofty dolomites crowning old Titan Major. Then with a glance at his compasses, a glance and reassuring smile over his shoulder, he straightened his direction out, pushed the throttle wide open, and roared away into the north, alone in the night sky with Aurore McNain.

A brisk head wind was blowing at eleven thousand feet, but the air was velvety smooth. Clear and starry, the night was dream-beautiful. A wilderness of peaks with only their rocky spires still moonlit lay beneath the Silver Hawk, fading into the dim horizon. Glaciers and neves swam away into the south; it was not the ship that moved, but the earth. Under keel yawned deep mountain valleys—profound depths of utter blackness, but lakes and river-widenings glittered and danced with reflection of myriad stars.

Daylight came slowly. Climbing to fifteen thousand feet, where he could sweep a vast expanse, Dorn reached out his binoculars. He knew he could not be more than ten miles off his course and could locate the lake at that distance. On the mountains west of it a huge glacier, riding the range like an octopus, was a prominent landmark. And he remembered the pass just south of it—a big mesa of sage grass and heather and fiery-colored avens where a band of goats had been pasturing when he whirled over with intervalometer clicking.

With the coming of full day he spotted the glacier, twelve miles dead ahead. A few minutes later, when the first rosy shafts of sunshine were kindling fires on Goat Mesa, he sailed out over the lake.

Aurore's lake—the Lake of the Dawn! It lay beneath him placid as a mirror, mountain-girt, deep and blue and unutterably lonely. No chance of having mistaken it; there were the seven little wildwood islands that he remembered—barely garden plots from his lofty height.

In great spirals and whistling dives he dropped down to three thousand feet. Aurore had told him that the cabin was located on the center island, biggest of the group. Dropping the controls, he thumbed the glasses and searched the pines below.

Not a sign of human habitation. If one was there it was certainly well snuggled away.

Puzzled he turned to Aurore. She too had stripped off her goggles and was looking down into the evergreens as he flew slowly over them. Suddenly she clapped her hands and he saw rather than heard her cry:

"There—there it is!"

Looking along her finger Dorn spotted it—a cabin nestling under four huge pines and all but hidden by their interlocking branches.

Picking out a cove on the island's eastern side, he zigzagged down, hit the water at a long diagonal, graceful as a swan alighting, and taxied into the shallows.

Standing on the cockpit edge, Dorn could see the cabin a hundred yards back in the mossy trees. Its door was closed. No smoke spiralled from the chimney.

He cupped his hands and shouted. No one appeared. No sign of life.

Until this moment he had doubted Aurore's story, had believed that someone was waiting for her there and that the danger from the 'breeds was at most a minor part of her trouble. But now, with that cabin seemingly lifeless and deserted, his opinion swerved and he believed her statements about her father; and the fear smote him that rescue had come too late.

"I'm going ashore," he announced, turning to Aurore, and added, to reassure her, "Your dad's probably given them the slip and left here, but I'll make sure."

She suggested quickly, "We'll both go."

He did not know what eyes might be watching them from covert of the woods, or what grim thing the cabin might house.

"No! You'd better stay here. I'll go alone."

In the canvas folding canoe he paddled hastily ashore. With the rifle at alert in his hands he started up a faint mossy path leading inland from the cove.

When he was twenty steps from the cabin he noticed a furry little animal nosing about the door. It whirled, saw him, fled into the woods with a shrill kee-yee-yee of terror.

A cub fox. All Dorn's tension suddenly broke. That keen-scented little flash of wildness would never have been playing around the cabin if human beings were inside!

He strode on up, pulled the latch, stepped in, his glance went first to the bunk, then swept around the room. He saw a doorway into a second room, walked over, looked inside.

No one was there. The cabin simply was deserted. And the surrounding woods and the whole island had that intangible feel, that peaceful silence, of human abandonment.

Hurrying back to the plane, Dorn told Aurore what he had found, took her ashore and up the path, and then began looking around for telltale signs.

What first aroused his curiosity was the cabin itself. It was a comfortable affair, not at all like the usual prospector camp; more like a small home than a shack built for a month or two. Its walls were double tiers of split logs filled in between with stamped clay and moss. It had five windows, though the beargut panes had rotted away. Besides a red-rusty stove, it had a fireplace where on chill evenings a man might indulge his primitive love of gazing into leaping

"Yes, 'fis," the sergeant agreed, not unfriendly. "But I don't know what for. All I know, orders was passed down for me to bring two squads and back up this man here." He jerked a thumb at the plain-clothes individual.

Across the table Dorn sized up the detective. Here then was the person he had to deal with. A man of some importance he seemed; possibly head of the private detective corps flung out in hunt of Aurore. He was thirty-odd, tall and lean, cadaverous of face, with eyes as cold as window-glass. A perfected sleuthing machine, a prototype of his calling—there was nothing warm-blooded or human about him.

The sergeant stepped up and ran his fingers over Dorn in search of weapon, and feeling some metal object on Dorn's breast, he drew back the jacket till he disclosed a military decoration—a pair of silver wings with bar "Regiments Etrangers" and pendant "Pour la Valeur." He stared at it a moment, then looked up at Dorn with something of respect and awe in his glance.

A constable jingled handcuffs. Dorn spoke past the sergeant to the detective: "I want to speak a minute with you. Suppose we talk this affair over. In private. You needn't be scared. You're gripping an automatic in your coat pocket, I notice. He saw the glint of wary suspicion in the man's eyes; and with a plan of escape rapidly crystallizing, he added: "My Christian friend, if you won't talk I'll send for a lawyer at the jail and I'll talk to him, and tomorrow morning the papers will run the whole story. How would you like that?"

His shot struck. The detective blinked his eyes slowly like a turtle. "We'll hold you incommun—" he started to say.

"You will like hell!" In a swift diplomatic appeal Dorn spun on the sergeant. "How about it, partner—do I have the right to a lawyer and habeas corpus?"

"We don't railroad anybody. After the examination's over, you've got the right." To the detective: "And 'less you slap some definite charge onto him, we can't hold him. Better make up your mind. Want to talk to him or not?"

The detective drew a black automatic, slipped the trigger safety and stepped over to the window to block that faint possibility of escape.

"If you're sure you frisked him clean for a gat, step outside a minute," he directed, in the polyglot of the crooks he associated with.

The sergeant nodded to his men and led them out into the corridor. With five of his enemies disposed of at one neat scoop, Dorn breathed easier. He had only to handle this Soft-Shoe.

He drew a couple of steps closer to the detective, as though to parley. He counted on the man ordering him to keep his distance. His maneuver worked. Soft-Shoe ordered him, "Get back," and emphasized it with a nervous flip of his automatic.

"All right," Dorn agreed scornfully, purposely backing up against the door, "if you're all that scared. Now let's get down to business. What do you want with me?"

"Nothing with you personal. We want to know where she faded to. I can make it worth while for you to come across."

There was no use pretending he knew nothing about Aurore. That would be clinging to a defense already demolished.

He surprised the detective by demanding abruptly, "How much?"

The electric light switch was pressing against his backbone and he could feel the door bolt against his shoulder blade, and he exulted that in a few minutes he would smash his way out of this trap.

Soft-Shoe evidently admired him for being sensible, that is, for having a price; and he became a little more communicative.

"I can't say definite how much. But I can get in touch with the party that can. Off-hand—if you take us where she's at and we get her and you promise to keep your mouth shut about her—I'd say twenty thousand."

For a second Dorn's thoughts went leaping away from his plan to escape. "Lord, twenty thousand dollars! Just for information. And detectives sowed from Haselton to Edmonton. Money, power, a relentless hunt—that's what Aurore said!"

"Do you know her?" he asked, rising slightly on his toes to hook his belt over the electric light switch. And when the detective nodded, Dorn haggled cold-bloodedly, "Then you know twenty thousand isn't much of a price for a girl like her."

"Mebbe so," Soft-Shoe agreed. "But it's twenty thousand or nothing. That much jack 'ud keep a fellow the rest of his life. You don't look like a man who'd lose his head over any floosey, and her—you know you got about as much chance as a snowball in hell of ever having her. That's out, bo!"

Dorn suddenly stiffened, forgetting the light switch, the door bolt. The words "That's out" were blunt statement of a blunt fact. Old Bergelot's warning rose up again, alive again. Both men, one his friend, the other, his deadly enemy, knew Aurore's story.

Outside on the street the squeal of familiar brakes recalled Dorn. Jerry had come, Jerry would run into the police . . .

"You mebbe could get habeas corpus and go back to her," Soft-Shoe went on, while Dorn estimated distances and gathered himself for explosive physical action. "But how long 'ud that nice little party last?. What chance have you got in a fight with us? If you try to be contrary, I'll give you a week to live. What'll it be now—you want that jack, or want to be bumped off because you went nuts over a floosey . . ."

Dorn came down on his heels. At the same instant that the room was plunged into darkness his hand shot up and sped the door bolt against the policemen. He ducked under the spurt of flame from the automatic, lunged across the room, and swung at the dim figure beside the window. Something like an iron maul caught the operative flush on the jaw. The automatic spun against the wall. Soft-Shoe heard the tintinnabulation of bells, his knees forgot their duty, his limp body wobbled, uncertain which way to fall, till Dorn's left fist lifted him clear off his feet and stretched him flat on the rug.

Dorn vaulted through the window to the sun roof below. He poised a moment on the balustrade, then leaped for the top of the rowan tree.

. . . . . .

One hundred and thirty miles west of Edmonton, in the south inlet of Lake Lobstick, Kansas Eby sat in the cockpit of an anchored D-H biplane, waiting.

For the twentieth time he pulled out of his pocket a crumpled yellow telegram and reread it.

EDWARD EBY CARTOGRAPHER
RCAF CAMP
EAGLE NEST

BRING THAT DH CRATE OVER TO LAKE LOBSTICK SOUTH INLET OPEN HER UP J. D.

Kansas knew the wire was from Dorn. It had been filed in Edmonton at eleven o'clock last night. Noon now of the next day and Dorn not yet come, though his message had been urgent. By train or automobile either one he should have showed up hours ago.

When the noon hour passed and nothing happened, Kansas decided it was high time to act. Switching on ignition, he idled the motor a few minutes, drew in the anchor, skittered down the inlet to warm the engine thoroughly, gave it the gun, bounded into the air and headed for Edmonton.

As he flew east he kept watching the brown ribbon of road beneath him, still faintly hoping Dorn might be coming; and so it came about that thirty miles east of Lake Lobstick he noticed an automobile creeping westward like a little bug along an ant run. Because a car was a rarity in that thinly settled country, he throttled down and paid particular attention to the automobile. From dead overhead he saw a man jump out, face up-turned, and wave arms and hat.

Dropping down, banking on vertical wing, Kansas flew back over—low enough this time to recognize the tall rangy figure of Jim Dorn.

In a duck pond a mile west he "sat down" and waited. The car came bumping along the rutty road hitting on two cylinders. It stopped where the pond curved closest to the road, and Kansas paddled ashore.

Dorn and a sawed-off, bow-legged individual named Jerry already were pulling out a pile of packages that completely filled the tonneau of the ancient sedan.

"Took a lot of patience," Dorn greeted, as they shook hands—"patience and two good mechanics and fourteen hours to coax this bus out here over these wagon ruts, Kansas, but here we are. Where in the world were you headed for?"

"Edmonton! I figured you was in a mixup, Jim. If I couldn't find you myself I expected to ask the police—"

Dorn paled. "You were going to ask the police!" Then he laughed in his silent way. "Some day you'll appreciate that joke. Don't ask questions. Help get this baggage out to the plane. Couple boat loads, pretty bulky; that's why I wired you to bring the D-H crate. Jerry, here's a hundred dollars. Hope you get home all right. Next Christmas I'll remember you with something substantial."

While Dorn was fetching the second canoe load, Kansas stood on a pontoon and restowed the packages in the fuselage cubby. He would have given a leg to know what was in them; and when he saw that the paper was already torn a bit on one, he did not think it very treacherous to probe a little with his finger. He came upon some garment of fine blue corduroy, and probing further he discovered it was a girl's skirt; and with still another twist of his fingers he disclosed a pair of tiny lace-boots.

"For Lord's sake!" He drew breath like a cow on a frosty morning. "For Lord's sake! It's that girl!. He met up with her somehow, Jim did. He's taking her these things to set her up in housekeeping. A whole crateful like this—means she's away inside the brush. He, Jim Dorn, the fellow that's been lecturing me for six years about women—he's got her, somewhere, in that howling wilderness . . . Lord! she was pretty, that night . . ."

He had thought of the girl a hundred times; of her haunting, wistful beauty as she stood in the lighted vestibule, and of her wraith-like elusiveness when he hunted for her in the cedar shadows; and he had almost come to believe that she was a creature of his own imagination. But here was proof of her actuality, and proof that Dorn had met her and in some way was bound up with her and the mystery of her.

The individual called Jerry waved his cap as the plane took off and headed west. A few minutes later Kansas glanced back at the rear seat. With parachute for a pillow, Dorn had eased himself into a comfortable position and was sound asleep.

It seemed to Kansas that his partner's stern face had lost something of its sternness and that he looked happier than in many moons. Then he noticed the lines under Dorn's eyes, the weariness of his features, the crusted blood on his knuckles; and he shrewdly reasoned:

"Jim's mixed up in some bad trouble! He used an automobile to get away from Edmonton because he didn't dare come by train! That girl was scared the night I saw her, and whatever she ran away from, that's what Jim is fighting."

He flew on, over the ever-rising foothills, west toward Eagle Nest, so lost in thought that he nearly hit the first snow-capped mountain.

CHAPTER IX

OVER the nose of his swift monoplane Dorn looked away into the northwest across a wilderness of evergreen valley and rocky spires and beautiful white neves, and far ahead sighted Goat Mesa, lit to fire by the early morning sun, and on farther saw a glint of blue from the upper end of the lake, Aurore's lake, the Lake of the Dawn. Unconsciously he pushed the throttle a notch wider.

He had left Eagle Nest three hours ago; and alone in the night sky, he had nothing to do but watch the needles of his instruments and try to arrange the strange happenings of the last five days into some understandable story.

During this night trip he had deliberated whether or not to tell her about having met her enemies. If she knew they had struck clew to her, she might give him information that would help him fight them. But as her lake unfolded, a quiet and peaceful refuge all out of the world of her trouble, he decided: "I'll not mention my close call in the city. It'd be a crime. If she knows they had me cornered and are trying to establish my identity right now, she won't have any peace or happiness."

He thought she would certainly be still asleep, this early in the morning, but as he skimmed above Goat Mesa and soared high out over the mirrory blue lake, there below him he saw Aurore, standing on their jutting rock, fishing for breakfast trout.

She heard the drone of his motor and looked up, and dropping her pole, hurried to the cove where he would come ashore. Again Dorn caught the flutter of a tiny handkerchief, and he dived down toward it in a tight, mile-long spiral and taxied into the shallows. When he drove the canoe to the bank Aurore was standing beside a great pine at water edge, and she greeted him with "Good morning, Mr. Jim!" and gave him both her hands when he stepped out.

Dorn took Aurore's hands, and their eyes met in a swift, smiling glance. He asked, "Everything been all right with you here?" He could see that it had. The ravages of her fear and worry which had tugged at him that first night down in his tent were altogether vanished. Her face was tanned a shade browner. She had a fillet around her forehead, and had done up her hair in a braided coil as a little bush-loper should, and her fingers were berry-stained. He continued:

"I sent your telegram and brought your outfit—"

She asked eagerly, "And the newspapers, Jim?"

He had fetched them ashore in the canoe with him, so he stooped and handed her the roll. Aurore seized it, broke the string; and Dorn observed how she glanced at the headlines and the front page column heading of the first paper, then passed to the second paper, the third and fourth. He thought, "She expected to find her trouble in the headlines—a front page story!" Then she glanced hastily at the inside sheets and drew a deep breath when she finished and looked up at him.

"It's not mentioned, Jim. Thank heaven, not a thing is known about it."

Dorn asked quickly: "Does that mean you're free to leave here? You're going back? . . ."

"No. Not at all. I'll stay here."

Dorn asked, "Your telegram then won't check the hunt at all?" And when Aurore shook her head emphatically. "Then why did you send it?"

"Because my duty was to send it. It was my duty to let them know I was alone and would never breathe a word. Now—now if this story becomes known it won't be my fault, because I warned them and promised not to disclose myself if they'd let me alone."

Aurore had not told him she was glad of his return, but Dorn had read that fact for himself in her eager running to meet him, in the warm welcome of her smile. And she had been lonely here in spite of the loveliness of her island.

She invited him: "Jim, do you have to return to work right away?"

He wanted to be back at Titan Pass and find out whether his enemies had made any move there in his absence. He anticipated trouble when he did return. If they worked as speedily as they had in Edmonton, they would be waiting for him. "But the morning here," he thought, "and the afternoon down there."

"No, I don't," he answered. "I'm comfortably ahead of my schedule." And while he was about it he paved his way for other visits: "In this cartographing we're limited to so much territory and so many air hours a week. A pilot can get tired without knowing it—especially us, flying a machine and operating a complex camera at the same time. So whenever I want to take time off, I can."

"Then you'll stay for breakfast—and awhile afterward? There's a hundred things on the island I want to show you, and we can have a long talk."

He slipped out of his cumbersome leather coveralls and hung them on a branch, and found the string of trout Aurore had caught.

"No, don't you help," he bade her. "I'll clean them."

Aurore left him presently and ran up the path to the cabin to start breakfast, and he was alone again with sober thoughts. He felt sure that his brush with Soft-Shoe was only a skirmish. Stripped of all sophistries, it was a battle over the bodily possession of a girl. The fear persisted that his enemies would discover who he was. If they did, the hunt for Aurore would narrow down, tighten down; they would concentrate on him instead of flinging their search across two provinces. He would be one man against a silent numerous pack, lone-handed against an enemy who had money and influence in high places, and could move police in a distant city to action.

As he swathed the trout in leaves and started up toward the cabin, the thought: "The way things stand now, I wouldn't have a ghost of a chance in a set-to battle. I wouldn't be fighting one or two or five men but a dozen or more. I've got to even up those odds. I've got to be ready. When I get back to Titan Pass, the first thing for me to do is wire to Edmonton for a machine gun."

After breakfast Aurore gathered up several bundles in her arms and disappeared into the tiny room, and her voice came out to him: "Jim, if you'll please go away . . . just a few minutes . . ."

Dorn sauntered out obediently, knowing what she intended. With his back to the cabin he leaned against the mossy bole of a pine and lit a pipe. A few minutes later he heard a twig snap and turned his head. Aurore had tiptoed up over the moss—so softly he had not known she was about till she snapped the twig. Ten feet away in a splash of sun she stood looking at him, very grave and demure; but he knew she had deliberately stopped in that pool of sun and wanted him to admire her in her new clothes.

She was wearing the woods-suit he had bought her—trim-belted jacket and short skirt of velvety corduroy and dainty lace-boots that came nearly to her knees, with just an inch or so of brown wood sock showing between them and the hem of her skirt. Snug and warm and durable, the suit fitted Aurore's slender body perfectly, and its color blended with the background of pine and moss.

On her breast she had pinned a nosegay of bog orchids and golden avalanche lilies.

He walked up close to Aurore, looking at her from head to foot. "They're awfully pretty—and sweet," he commented, awkflame. There were shelves for grub pails and niches in the walls; a settee, chairs, hall tree, and other pieces of furniture, all handmade of unbarked wood.

Dorn thought, dogmatically: "No prospector's camp is this. And no Indian built it, either. It was built by a white man who liked his comfort and was willing to work for it."

He glanced about for detailed signs which might indicate who had lived here and when. A number of great black-and-golden woods spiders had invaded the cabin and spun their large webs from the rafters. A "seven-thousand-foot rat," which had built its nest in the stove, was timidly peeping out of the draft intake at the two human intruders. There was moss on the doorstep rock—green and undisturbed. The paths leading away had sprung up with violets. Both bunks, in the large and small room, had spruce-tip mattresses; but the needles were so old and sere that they crumbled to dust in Dorn's fingers.

"Aurore!" He whirled to her in astonishment. "This cabin hasn't been used in several years!"

Aurore heard him, but as one walking in a dream. She was gliding about the cabin in eager, wide-eyed rapture; standing tiptoe at the shelves; peering into the niches, her eyes a-sparkle; laughing, but with a strange catch in her voice, as she glanced at herself in a cracked old mirror.

Dorn had been astounded by her pointing out the cabin half an hour ago. The absurd thought had flashed across his mind that she once had lived here. He had pushed it aside, then, as impossible. No Indians ever hunted in this region; only a few prospectors had penetrated it.

But impossible or not, absurd or not, he knew Aurore had lived here. For even as he watched her she flitted over to a niche above the bunk and drew out an old pigskin book of trout flies and gut leaders brittle as glass with age. She had known it was there!

On the heels of that discovery came another, a dozen times more amazing still. Aurore was not looking at the signs of neglect, she was not puzzled by the plain evidence of the cabin's long unoccupancy, she showed not the slightest concern in finding her father gone.

A truth gradually dawned upon Dorn as he stood watching her. From her strange actions and the cabin's deserted loneliness there was one and only one conclusion to draw. He did not want to believe it, but sheer fact compelled him.

Aurore had never expected to find her father here. No one had been living here. The whole story about her father and the breeds and the rescue trip was a conspiracy between her and old Bergelot. It was a falsehood from beginning to end.

CHAPTER V

FROM the doorway of the tiny room Aurore happened to glance at Dorn and marked the expression of his features; and stopped suddenly in her rapt eagerness, and stood looking at him, stock-still, frightened, realizing that he had seen through the deception, and that the inevitable fiddler was now to be paid.

She held out her hands to him in a humble gesture of entreaty. Dorn's face hardened. In that moment he could think of nothing but that he had been tricked.

"Well," he said in cold level voice, "it's some solace to remember that I didn't quite swallow that story of yours."

He would not move; it was Aurore who came to him. She came up very close, slowly, and with visible effort made herself look up to meet his eyes.

"Yes, I lied," she confessed, with no pretence or evasion. "It was shameful. It was wicked. But I had to lie. You'd never have brought me if I had told you the—I don't believe you would have, and I didn't dare take chances."

She was penitent, and afraid of his anger. But she went bravely on:

"Because I was a girl you took what I said on trust. It hurt me, hurt worse than my having to lie. And I'll never forget how you spoke up, without a single thought of the trouble or danger to you, and said you'd go. That was like a stab—"

"Don't bother about having tricked me; I've erased myself from this equation," Dorn interrupted in curt tones. "If you'll tell me what's next, I'll set about it and then get out of the road."

"What's next . . . You—out of the road. . . . I don't understand . . ." Aurore seemed bewildered by his words.

"You came up to this lake to meet somebody. He evidently hasn't arrived yet. I'll see to making you comfortable here before I go."

"But I didn't expect to meet somebody—" she started to deny.

"What? You didn't expect—what—?"

"I was trying to get away—away from somebody."

For a moment or two Dorn could merely stare at Aurore, doubting if he had heard her aright. Even in his amazement he could not fail to notice the candor in what she said, the sincerity in her voice. Not to meet but to get away from somebody. Again she spoke:

"No one is coming here. I fled. From . . . trouble. I escaped to Dad Bergelot's. He persuaded me to come across to you because you, an aviator—you could take me away quickly, and leave no trail."

A hundred questions were galloping through Dorn's brain. What was this pursuit she dreaded? Whom had she fled from? How had she known about this cabin so well that she could guide him to it up across two hundred miles of wilderness straight as the flight of a teal? What tragedy lay beneath this mere surface fact that she had fled from something, from somebody?

He said: "I know you were in some dread. I saw that, down in my tent." He asked her. "But what was your purpose in coming to this lake?"

"To hide. To find . . . sanctuary. I'm going to live here."

"Live here? You—alone?"

"Yes, alone."

It seemed so incredible to Dorn that a girl should attempt to live alone here in the heart of this appalling wilderness that for a little space he forgot those other questions.

"If you really mean, if it can be possible you mean that, why didn't you tell me your intentions down in my tent? I'd have made you up an outfit—camp stuff and food—from my things. How on earth do you expect . . . nothing but a porcupine could find a meal in this cabin!"

"Dad Bergelot put a pack for me in your airplane. That's why he stayed behind when you came back to me at the tent."

Dorn stared. "Humph! While you were tricking me you did the thing up brown!" He was more than a little mortified at being taken in so neatly. And by a girl! These details were Aurore's work. "Well, I'll go down and get your pack," he said, and turned on his heel and left her.

As he went down the path he noted, but subconsciously, that whoever had built this cabin had chosen a superb wilderness location. The island was free from the scourge of mosquitoes and brule flies, the funnel-shaped contour of the north and south bay, blowing the insects away.

In the fuselage cubby Dorn found the bundle of camp things which Bergelot had secreted there for Aurore. Lifting it out, he smiled wryly at the thoroughness of her tricking him.

His smile faded when he unbuckled the canvas and saw the pathetic meagerness of the outfit. A skillet, a couple of pans, a hair comb, some fishing tackle, an H. B. belt-ax, two worn blankets, food to last a week or ten days at most—that was all.

As Dorn looked down at the few pitiful articles and realized how utterly inadequate they were, a wave of sympathy for Aurore surged through him. He had been a little antagonized by her wealth, and sympathy had seemed out of place. He had not altogether shaken off the effects of those poverty years when he had looked over alien fences into estates of the rich and felt his position keenly. But now Aurore's wealth was stripped from her. Poor girl, she hadn't even the stark necessities of life!

Getting his emergency food packet and two extra blankets of his own that she could sleep warm, he took the things ashore and started up to the cabin.

As he saw it now, Aurore was in some desperate trouble, and had shrunk back from telling the truth to him, a stranger. She had been driven to the lie. And he understood now the cold, hard suspicion in her eyes when she took his measure as a man. Old Bergelot had literally given her into his hands. During all the time she lived there he would be her sole link with civilization. She was utterly dependent upon him for food and protection and all the human company she would ever have.

Conscience-stricken for being angry at her, he hurried on to the cabin. From the threshold he saw Aurore, still standing as he had left her, in the middle of the first room, a forlorn and pathetic figure, but still unbeaten, and glorious with that sunlight now resting on her shoulders and breast. It came to Dorn again with renewed force how utterly dependent she was upon him, and how hard a blow his anger must have been.

The pack dropped from his hands. At a loss what to say or do he stepped over to Aurore, torn between a desire to comfort and yet not frighten her. When she looked up at him, he was shocked by her weariness. Body and soul, she was near exhaustion.

"Mr. Dorn, I've decided"—she spoke with no reproach or bitterness, but with a stranger's aloofness, more painful to Dorn than either, because it seemed to push him miles away from her—"that I should tell you the truth about myself before you go."

It was more than evident to Dorn that she did not want to tell him of her trouble. She had not expected to tell him, but his anger had made her decide to. She was doing it to discharge an obligation; to close out the accounts between them and shut the book of their acquaintanceship.

Dorn interrupted her. All too clearly he could read the signs of a fearful let-down in her nervous tension. The excitement of her escape, of the air trip, had buoyed her up until now, but, even as she spoke, he had to reach out his arm to steady her.

"Please," he said firmly, "don't try to talk or tell me anything. Later on, after you rest . . . if you want to then, all right. But now you've got to lie down and sleep a few hours." And he made his appeal personal by adding, "I don't want a sick girl on my hands here. I'll be getting things in shape for you."

She was too weary to protest, but let him have his way. Dorn went outside the musty-smelling cabin to a nook in a clump of pines, and hastily lopped off a few branches to make a little brush lodge; and bringing his own warm blankets, he spread a pair of them under the shelter, with his jacket as a pillow for Aurore. From the cabin door he pointed it out to her.

"I thought you'd sleep better out there," he explained. "I'll be nosing around in here. This is a wild, lonely place, but you needn't be afraid of bears—or wolves."

Aurore caught the subtle meaning of his words. For a moment her dark-lashed eyes, in spite of their clouded weariness, searched his face with the same keen appraisal that he had noticed down in the tent. But now, that suspicion of him had dropped from them.

She said quietly: "I'm not afraid of—of wolves, if they please won't be angry with me again."

With a pine bough Dorn swished down the spider webs and swept the cabin. Carrying the stove outside, he dumped out the rat and sent it scurrying, cleaned the bunks of their old mattresses, made Aurore a fresh bed of billowy spruce twigs in the tiny room, and brought water from the cove.

Toward midmorning he stopped long enough in his work to walk over to the brush lodge and chase away a noisy, inquisitive moose-bird. Aurore was still asleep, her head pillowed on her arm, her jacket loosened at the throat. The morning sunshine had crept down the pine holes and fell in golden pools upon the moss, and one splash of it was creeping along her outstretched arm toward her face. Very silently Dorn adjusted one of the boughs so that it would shade her until noon."

There was a touch of the wild young forest thing about Aurore. She had been reared in the open, he knew; and whatever her present trouble was, the background of her life had been sunlit and happy. Her lips exquisitely arched and her mouth firmly tucked in at the corners were made to laugh.

He backed away silently, got his belt ax and went in search of wood.

CHAPTER VI

AT NOON, on one of his trips to the cabin with the fuel, his eyes fell upon eight Dolly Varden trout, fresh-cleaned and swathed in leaves, lying on the block table. In astonishment he hurried out to the brush lodge.

Aurore was gone. The blankets were neatly folded; his jacket hung on a twig; the impress of her body was still plain on the moss. Dorn looked all around, and, not seeing her, whistled; and when she answered, a strong clear whistle from the lower end of the island, he downed the impulse to go seek her out, and went on about his work.

On his next trip he suddenly met Aurore coming around the corner of the cabin. She had bathed her face and hands and freshened up her hair. Her color was heightened. Her eyes laughed at him for sweating under the huge load of wood, and there was a purl of happiness in her voice.

"You ought to have been along with me—J—Jim." She tripped momentarily over his name, but went right on. "I was down at the south edge where it's open and marshy. I found Arctic cranberries and a bed of white strawberries that'll be ripe in ten days, and coming back I saw a fox den and met a porcupine and gathered some— But look here."

Dorn slammed the wood against the cabin wall and looked into the birchrind creel she carried. It was full of mushrooms. It was big as a saucer, white on top, with gills a suspicious wine-pink.

"What are you going to do with those things?" he demanded.

Aurore laughed gaily. "Why, we'll eat them! You needn't be shy. They taste somewhat like fried chicken, only better. Now if you'll build me a fire in the stove, Jim—I'm desperately hungry and you must be too—we'll have dinner in five minutes!"

As he knelt by the sheet-iron stove and whittled shavings, Dorn swore softly, incoherently, to himself. Heavens above him!—what cloud had Aurore McNain dropped from—a girl like her, in those fashion-plate clothes, with that breath of society all about her and that hunted desperation in her eyes, but now all neat and sparkle, pitching in, helping, cooking dinner, instead of sitting by, looking sweet. He argued, "That girl knows the bush inside out; knows it in Latin, French and Siwash!"

During their meal together, he kept wondering how much Aurore was going to tell him about herself. Surely a hint or two. But she seemed reluctant. Not once in the last half hour had she even alluded to the mysterious something which she had fled out of civilization to escape.

With plans for her safety and comfort running in his mind, he asked: "How long are you going to live here, Aurore?"

"I don't know; I can't say now. But I expect to have to stay a month at least."

Dorn merely nodded and went on with his planning. Over their coffee, he fished a memo pad and pencil stub from his pocket and handed them across the table to her. "You need an outfit," he explained, as she looked at him in question. "I'll fetch it next trip, if you'll make a list. I have to go in to Edmonton shortly. Can start just as well this afternoon."

"But I won't be a bother—I never intended you to do more than bring me—you've done enough for me now! Getting away from Titan Pass meant everything to me, Jim."

"Make out your list," he repeated. "You couldn't live here two weeks on what you've got, and you're bush-wise enough to know it."

"But I haven't any money! And I don't dare draw on any of my deposits, or that'd establish a connection between you and me—" Aurore stopped, as though a thought suddenly came to her. "But gracious! I'm not penniless. Why didn't I think?" She reached into her jacket pocket and triumphantly brought out the barrette he had seen in her hair. "There! You can sell that. It ought to bring a thousand; it cost three."

Dorn pocketed the jewel thoughtfully. He meant to buy her an outfit with his own money; he had five hundred on hand, and that amount would set her up comfortably in housekeeping. But she would need money when and if she left this refuge, and the barrette would supply those funds.

"Will it be safe," he asked, "to sell this?"

"Yes, perfectly safe in Edmonton."

While Dorn smoked a cigarette Aurore scribbled and pondered. She needed his help, his protection, and knew it, and quietly accepted the situation instead of escaping the burden of gratitude by pretending she did not wish him to help her further.

"I don't like the idea of your being here by yourself," he remarked pocketing her list. "Of course, this is a lonesome place; one chance in a thousand of any Indian or bush-sneak white, happening along and seeing you; but—"

"I'm used to the bush, Jim. I can take care of myself."

"I believe you can, at that! I'll leave my rifle with you, and we'll fix up some rattle-bang contraption on the door for nights."

Shortly afterward Dorn decided to leave. Aurore took him down to the island edge where a mossy boulder jutted out into the lake, and they sat down there to talk. Dorn held the painter of his canoe. In the cove at his left his plane lay waiting for him.

"You lived here before," he spoke up, wanting to draw Aurore out of the past that was closed for him to the present moment that he shared. "But why did you so especially want to come back here?"

She was toying abstractedly with the laces of her small boots. "I wanted to be alone, Jim. I've got much to think about and get straight. And I was a girl here. In a way this is home to me."

"Did you live just here?"

"No, everywhere—from Chilcotin to Dawson. But more here than any other place."

"It's funny—I roamed the same territory. I went Outside, too, and here we are, both back. Our trails must have crossed in the old days. Where all did you go? Were you ever at White Horse, Glenora, Cassiar Bar—?"

"You bet I was!" It was a tomboy speaking. "I cut my hair off at Cassiar Bar and dressed up like a boy, and that's when I got

"How come, Effie? You're not admitting this rain is a surprise. Why, even I could tell by the feel of my feet that we were about due for a deluge."

"Yes, Clara, it's a pleasure to admit that I am now an ex-weather prophet. No longer do my feet cringe and ache at the approach of a storm."

"What bliss! Do you mind telling me, dear, how you conquered your foot troubles? Some heroic treatment, I'll wager!"

"Just the opposite, honey. The treatment is as mild and pleasing as it is effective, and, best of all, the relief seems permanent."

"This is going to be good! Tell me all, Clara."

"Well, to be brief, I took my cue from Frank, who had nothing but trouble with his feet until he found relief in Walk-Over Main Spring Arch Shoes. I'm telling you, the Walk-Over salesman knows his stuff. My feet have been better dressed and absolutely free from aches since he fitted my first pair of Walk-Over Main Spring Arch Shoes. Jesberg's Walk-Over Shop is right here on Broadway, Effie. Why not let me introduce you to real foot comfort?"

"How thrilling, Clara! I'm keen to meet the party."

The WAR BENEATH the WATERS

The Deutschland, the First Submarine Merchantman, Makes Its Transatlantic Voyage

By Captain Paul Koenig

Commander of the "Deutschland"

WAR! It's war! Like a flash of lightning from a cloudless sky this hurricane of news broke over the heads of the German people.

To us Germans the state of war meant first and foremost an exile from the whole neutral world. It meant a state of isolation from all in that world which

The trip we made in such circumstances won us the sympathy of the American people, apparently without reference to their personal opinions of their influence politically or socially. The United States government took official cognizance of the problem we contrived for it—were we to be deemed a signal the fact that these lights were too blinding. Thereupon the rays of the offensive searchlight were turned off. This was done in a somewhat unusual way. Before being extinguished, the shaft of light went up for a couple of seconds straight aloft in the sky. As the light went thus mysteriously out I felt sure that I saw the outlines of an American fishing steamer.

As soon as my eyes got accustomed to the night again, I saw in the direction of Newport News a powerful searchlight dart straight up the heavens, and there hold its interminable length sheer and full. It became obvious to me at once that the fishing schooner or rather steamer which had just lit us up was connected in some fashion or other with the ribbon of light climbing the sky. This must be a hint to the enemy ships on the prowl outside the three-mile limit.

I got my bearings quickly by means of the beacon fire. I lost no time in getting well within my conning-tower. I closed the hatch behind me.

"Plunge to eighteen meters!" I gave the order grimly. "Turn 160 degrees! Both motors! Slow forward!"

With the least forward inclination the submarine sank gently below the surface. Soon it had reached the prescribed eighteen meters. Then I had time to go over the situation with the first officer.

The possibility of utilising this deep southern channel to make my exit I had already begun to doubt back in Baltimore, when I got wind of the fishing vessels anchoring hereabouts. In view of what my own eyes had seen just now I felt certain that someone was on the watch outside with nets all ready to spread them—if they were not spread already—for the Deutschland. These fishing boats were to blockade the deep channel—it was some two miles wide—with nets the instant they got the signal by searchlight from Newport News. The submarine in her course under water would be caught by her screws. The alternative was for the boat to come to the surface.

The instant the conning-tower emerged into the air I clambered out. It was pitch dark around me. My eyes had to adapt themselves to the inky blackness before I could see a thing. We were in the true channel. Of so much I convinced myself. I made out right behind me at the same time a big and brightly-lit American destroyer. The vessel steamed out of the dark noisily.

I rushed back through the hatchway. As I closed it with a snap behind me, I called out to the engine operating room, using the speaking tube: "Plunge quick, 22 meters deep!"

It began now to look to me as if we had got beyond the limits to which American official authority—or perhaps I should say power—could reasonably be expected to extend. Perhaps I was some thousand yards or more from those limits. With rudder hard to port, we turned straight around and went in the opposite direction straight back into the bay!

The submarine had gradually run her forward part upon the bed of the bay, which hereabouts rose as gradually. I at once ordered the boat to the surface and opened the hatch of the conning-tower again. When this time I scrambled out into the night I saw the lightship about a hundred yards—perhaps more—ahead.

With rudder hard to starboard, we got away again. This time we went half submerged only, making use of the electric motor. My object in doing so was to avoid attracting the attention of the crew of the lightship by the noise of the pumping of the diving tanks and beating of their batteries. In another quarter of an hour the diving tanks were pumped out and the boat made as light as possible; the Diesel engines we could thus dispose of. Our course was north-northeast to the northern entrance of the bay.

The night was now excessively dark. The moon would not be in the heavens for two hours more. The opportunity was favorable. The chart at my disposal was of exceptional accuracy, and I was guided by it as far as its indications went. I kept well within the northern course I had marked for myself. I held true also to the northern channel. Making the machinery yield all it was capable of, and with scarcely more than 3 feet of water under the keel—sometimes actually less—I held on north-by-east straight out of Chesapeake Bay.

From minute to minute I felt that we were safer and safer. At ten o'clock I noticed that the searchlights of the enemy, although still on the quest, were growing fainter in the heavens and upon the waters. I saw them fade out wholly. I felt a sly joy, the thrill of a thief in the night. The first officer put this sentiment into words by the inference he drew from all the circumstances:

"The fellows will have to stay all night on guard. Perhaps longer. For the next day at least they'll think we're not yet out of the hole."

Towards midnight I altered our course to the east. By two o'clock in the morning we were in deep water. This meant that we were no longer in peril of capture.

Before us lay the broad Atlantic Ocean!

Exactly twenty-one days later the Deutschland reached the harbour of Heligoland. A day passed, and then she was in the Weser, hailed by the whole German people with jubilation.

An Almost Total Loss

He got up, took the cup and stood looking down at her. She giggled.

"Am I as dirty as you are?"

"I'm afraid you are—a little soiled. But you—you're very wonderful all the same. More wonderful than I ever dreamed a girl like you could be."

She looked down at the slippers, steaming malodorously in the heat of the fire. "You're not so bad, yourself."

He took her hands, drew her gently to her feet. She stood docilely while he fastened the buttons of the great coat at her throat. Then she asked, "And now what?"

"Now I'm going to send you home," he told her.

She sighed. "You would."

"I'd like to take you but that's impossible, so I'm sending you in my car. You'll tell my man where to take you."

"Yes, doctor."

"When you get there, I want you to go to bed. After that you're to have a light breakfast and after that, you're going to go to sleep."

Mr. Lysle's breakfast was interrupted by the most astonishing apparition. He stared at it up and down, from the folds of soiled gauze crowning its head to the felt slippers showing beneath the skirt of its bulky greatcoat. Then he bounded to his feet.

"Ted! My God, child, what has happened?"

"Nothing much," she apologized. "I've just been trying to—to stir up interest in my talents, but I couldn't get a darn bid."

For two days Teddy Lysle lay, a slim, inert wafer, listlessly regarding the world from her pillow. She appeared to have but two interests in life—food and the weather.

On the second morning, she asked her father, "Isn't it cold out? I mean, really cold. Cold enough for a man to need his overcoat?"

He was deeply touched. "Perhaps it is, darling. I'll wear it if it will make you feel easier."

Which he did. But the sacrifice failed of its effect. When he returned from his office in the late afternoon, he found her restless and fretful.

"I should think that doctor would need his coat," she said. "Didn't you say you telephoned him?"

"Immediately, dear, to thank him. I offered to send the coat to him but he said he thought he'd be coming out this way in a day or so."

And after dinner he did come.

His manner was admirably professional as he sat down beside the charming little bed. "I'm glad to see that you followed my instructions," he said.

"I thought you'd be pleased. I—I suppose you've come for your coat."

"My what? Oh, yes, yes, and to bring this." He took a longish, fattish envelope out of his pocket. "The trustees of the hospital asked me to deliver it for them, since I was the only person who knew who and where you were. May I read their message?"

"To me?" she said. "Why, yes."

He read gravely. "'The trustees of this hospital would consider themselves honored, if the young woman who displayed such splendid courage and rendered such valuable assistance during the recent unfortunate conflagration would accept the inclosed as an inadequate expression of their gratitude.'"

"They probably thought," he said, "since you were a ward patient that money would be more acceptable than anything else."

She took the packet of crisp, new bills, counted them hastily and cried, "Two hundred dollars! But what for? I didn't try to sell them anything!"

Which was true enough. But then she might have said the same of the spic and span young doctor. Yet, when she lifted her eyes she found his upon her and they, too, held an unmistakable bid for some treasure of soul or spirit he appeared to have discovered in this almost total loss.

flame. There were shelves for curly pelts and rifles in the walls; a settee, chairs, half tree, and other pieces of furniture, all handmade of unpainted wood.

Dorn thought, deprecatingly: "The prospector's camp is like. And no Indian built it, either. It was built by a white man who liked his comfort and was willing to work for it."

He glanced about for Celestial signs which might indicate who had lived here and when. A number of great bear-and-cubskin [illegible]

"Well," he said in cold level voice, "it's some solace to remember that I didn't quite swallow that story of yours."

He would not move; it was Aurore who came to him. She came up very close, slowly, and with visible effort made herself look up to meet his eyes.

"You, I lied," she confessed, with no preface or evasion. "It was simply that I was terrified. But I lied to Mr. Yard never more than I had to. I had told you the—I don't believe you would have, and I didn't dare [illegible] a morning. Do you remember Foster Purdy—Foot—"

"I gave him a wonderful thrashing once for cheating me on a truck of furs . . ."

For half an hour they sat talking of places and of people they knew in common, and recounting those queer stories and incredible anecdotes which had gathered like barnacles on this mining camp or that fur post.

From hints that Aurore dropped, Dorn understood that her father had been an engineer or field scientist, or engaged in some profession which would take him to various places throughout the Northwest. Aurore had been her father's tomboy, and loped the bush with him, to Chilcotin, Dawson, Telegraph Creek and Cassiar Bar, where she got "a spanking" for cutting her hair off. In that incident Dorn could see that her father had been something of a Victorian—a little stern with his girl, but loving her so much that he took her with him everywhere and personally gave her an education such as no other girl of Dorn's acquaintance possessed.

Then Aurore had gone Outside; probably for a formal schooling, and there this trouble had come upon her. It was all the more unfathomable—this trouble—considering what a wholesome and sensibly guided girlhood hers must have been, and what a comradely, sweet girl Aurore was now.

When Dorn rose and gave her his hand to rise, he asked, "Isn't there anything, besides bringing your outfit, I can do?"

Aurore said thoughtfully: "Jim, I will ask a couple more favors of you. Won't you bring me several newspapers, please? Today's, tomorrows, the next day's."

Nodding, he thought, "She's expecting her trouble to be in the papers!" He asked, "What's the other thing I can do?"

"You'll send a telegram for me in Edmonton?"

"Yes, certainly." He gave her pencil and note pad again; and when she had written, he put the message into his pocket.

"I think you'd better phone it from some station and have it sent collect, Jim, to avoid going in person to a telegraph office."

"What? Do you mean there's danger, even in Edmonton? That far away?"

"My telegram will be traced back. They must never establish any connection between you and me. With your help I've dropped out of sight. I'm being hunted; but here—here they'll never find me!"

"They?" Dorn echoed, and he was gladdened to hear that her trouble was not with one particular person. He had thought all along that she had come upon some private tragedy, but "they" sounded as though she were involved in something bigger. Her next words left no doubt of that.

"You're my only link with the Outside, Jim, and you'll walk carefully, I know. But I want to to make you understand—back of this hunt there's money and power and a relentless purpose—more than you dream about. There'll be spies flung out, watching along the Canadian National, from Hazelton clear to Medicine Lodge. You'll be careful, Jim, very careful. One unguarded word, one misstep . . ."

For a moment that desperate fear was in Aurore's eyes again. "Money, power, relentless purpose"—the words re-echoed in Dorn's brain. Groping for some light upon her trouble, he asked her a question which sounded innocent and proper but which she could not answer without giving him some clew.

"Can't you tell me whom or what to be on my guard against?"

Aurore thought a moment, then looked up at him frankly.

"It wouldn't help you any to know. And if I told you, it would mean telling everything. If you insist—and you've earned the right to—I will. But you wouldn't understand. One person never can fully understand another. When you know me better, when I know more about you—this is my promise, Jim—I'll tell you what I did and what I fled from. But now I've told you as much as I dare."

She was facing him squarely, looking directly into his eyes. Her own had a sort of desperate pleading in them. In an instant he felt ashamed and his fine smile swept over her.

"Good-by," he said.

Paddling out to the Silver Hawk, he stowed the canoe in the fuselage and took off. Circling over the island while he climbed for altitude, he looked down at the jutting boulder. Aurore was still standing there. As he lined away south he looked back, and caught the tiny flutter of a kerchief. It would be four or five days, he thought, before he saw her again. She was a brave little self-sufficient soul—true enough—but he hated to leave her to this immense mountain solitude.

CHAPTER VII

BACK at Titan Pass, Dorn put his tent in order and then skirted across to the mainland in his canoe. A couple of minor details of guarding his camp had to be attended to before he flew east to Eagle Nest and took the train on in to Edmonton, but his main purpose was to find out whether there was any stir or whisper of trouble at the jump-down. Aurore had told him that men would be silently hunting for her, that detectives would be making inquiries, trying to pick up her trail, at all the stations along the Canadian National. If spies were searching at Titan Pass, Dorn wanted to be warned, for once her enemies found clew of her and started tracking her down, then he would have to take Aurore's battle upon himself.

At the station Dorn came upon a fat, nearly naked Indian squatting against the logs like a gingerbread statue, as immobile as Buddha.

"Kah nititis nina tillicum siwash Luke Illewahwacet?" Dorn demanded in the Chinook jargon.

The Indian told him old Luke was at Bergelot's cabin. Dorn strode on up.

Behind the cabin old Bergelot sat smoking. His jaw dropped open when he saw who came; plainly he expected Dorn to scorch him with anger for being party to a deception. But Dorn could not think any act deception which had brought him into the acquaintance and the friendship of Aurore McNain.

Old Luke Illewahwacet, squatting on his haunches in the sun, was carving a horn spoon for his ancient squaw to sell.

The aged Beaver was a lovable old cynic, a bush Cato, a stern misogynist. In the spring of his young manhood he had been a mighty hunter among his people, the Mountain Beavers, who had vanished before the white man's sicknesses and fight-water. In dress and habits of life and grave dignity Luke still clung to the ways of his ancestors. His deer-hide skirt rattled all over with grizzly claws—grizzlies killed not by rifle but by ram's horn bow. The greasy narkhin or medicine robe flung around his shoulders was pictured with the salient exploits of his life.

"Luke," Dorn spoke to him in the jargon, "I go away four, five sun. You come back along me in boat to island camp in my teepee, keep eyes yahkisilth so bad-egg 'breeds like Joe Yoroslaf no walk away with my stuff. Two dolla chicambin each sun pay. You go, huh?"

Old Luke nodded.

"Kloshe!" Dorn commented. "You go now get shoot-stick. I wawa Bergelot two, three minutes, then be along you down by boat."

When the old Beaver had stalked away, Dorn glanced around to be sure no one was within earshot, and lowered his voice and spoke in French to Bergelot. "Have you noticed any strangers hanging about here?"

"There is a man, ou'. He came from the east on the morning train. He is down at halfbreed cabins inquiring."

Dorn felt a shock go through him. Were "they" on her trail already?

"You were just talking to Luke. He sees and knows everything; did he mention any rumors of a strange girl getting off here last night?"

"Only you, M'sieur Jeem, and I, know about her."

That was some reassurance. Had any 'breed or Indian seen Aurore, the report would have had repercussions at this sleepy jump-down and Bergelot would have heard the echoes of it. The stranger was probably one of many detectives. Without shadow of doubt the search was on for her at all the mountain stations.

"Money, power, a relentless purpose . . ." Dorn had thought Aurore exaggerated, but he saw now her words were stark truth. The enemy she had fled from meant business. By splendid luck she had escaped clean, and an airplane had whirled her two hundred miles north into the wilderness. She was safe—just so long as no one found out his connection with her.

"Her clothes weren't in my tent. What did you do with them?"

"They are inside."

Dorn walked around and went into the cabin. There were Aurore's clothes on a peg, clumsily covered over with a mackinaw, where any sharp-eyed operative could have spotted them at a glance.

With his back to the window Dorn took them down and laid them across his arm. What he intended to do seemed a desecration; for besides their rich beauty, Aurore had been clad in them when she came to him. But with no hesitation he stepped over to the stove and put them into it, one by one—slippers, cape, the belted suit, her silken hose and filmy undergarments—hoping he would thus destroy the last evidence of her having been at Titan Pass.

Old Bergelot followed him in. Dorn, looking sharply, saw that the old man was gathering courage to say something.

"What's troubling you, Dad?" he asked kindly.

The rusty old voice was apologetic. "It is good of you, Jeem lad, to take the sorrows of other folk on yourself. You must not fall upon calamity. I should have spoken up last night, Jeem lad, while we waited in the dark for her to dress. But a warning would have seemed ridiculous then. now . . . Jeem lad, you have changed. You came up the path whistling. You smiled at Luke and me. It is not your usual way to light cigarettes and toss them out the window."

"All of us"—Dorn meant his brotherhood of aviators—"we're nervous after a flight. I just came in from one."

Bergelot took up the word. "You've made many flights, yes. But last night, that was different from any before. Or from any you will ever make again. When you carried Aurore McNain away with you, then you began the Great Flight."

Dorn did not deny it further. He was aware of something momentous to come. "What of it?" he demanded a little pale. "You mean I might come to love her. Would that be calamity?"

"Yes. An evil hour."

"What? Evil! Why? You tell me why!"

In that silence old Bergelot seemed gathering courage for a blunt, tremendous sentence. He poured the words out like a bucket of rocks.

"Because, Jeem lad, you can never under heaven marry her."

Afterward, on his flight east to Eagle Nest that evening, Dorn grappled for two lone hours with the mystery behind old Bergelot's "You can never . . ."

It had angered him, a momentous statement like that, thrown out with so subconscious word of explanation. He had pumped and cross-examined. But the old man, his warning delivered, had drawn into his shell like a moss-backed land tortoise, and his stony silence was impregnable as the Rock of Gibraltar.

To every question he had stubbornly replied: "It is not my story to tell, but hers. She has promised you."

Dorn's first thought had been that Aurore was married. That was an easy explanation of the warfling. But he had probed beneath the surface. Old Bergelot spoke of her as Mam'selle Aurore, and with no hesitation about the Mam'selle part of it. Once, as a trap, Dorn had called her Mrs. McNain. The name sounded odd in his own ears, and he knew from Bergelot's reaction that it sounded still more odd to the old man.

He remembered the telegram she had asked him to send; and hoping it would give him some insight into her trouble, he pulled it out and read.

The message was addressed to a man in Calgary whom Dorn vaguely recalled as owner of a string of small-town newspapers. It commanded:

> Get in touch with H. C. S. Tell him I am safe, alone, and wish to remain so. If this becomes known, it will be because he insists upon finding me.
> AURORE.

Dorn reasoned: "That man in Calgary knows her. This H. C. S. is the chief among her enemies. They want to find her. It must be a matter of terrible importance to them. But why? And what did she flee from?"

At Eagle Nest late that evening he spiralled down upon the aviation camp of his fellow birdman and had the Silver Hawk towed ashore where three mechanics with full equipment could overhaul it while he was in Edmonton.

Kansas was gone—fishing back in the mountains. Dorn was glad he was away. Kansas would have asked him questions. Dorn did not want to lie to a partner. In six years of mutual adventuring, mutual peril, mutual plans for their future, he had never concealed any serious trouble from Kansas. He believed, too, that a storm might break upon him in the days ahead and he knew how Kansas would come roaring across the mountains to back him up. In the face of that loyalty a lie would be shameful.

In the tent he noticed a pile of newspapers. The latest paper, an Edmonton publication, was only a couple of days old. Perhaps here . . .

Methodically, while waiting for the train, Dorn started down through the pile. From every page he expected the picture of Aurore to leap up at him, with some screaming headline of what she had done. Outside the front sheets which ran to the hot political campaign and the society columns which ran to middle-aged hostesses wearing pearl necklaces, he did find several pictures of women and write-ups about them. Once he paused at the account of a daring banditry over at Prince Rupert—the direction she had come from—but the hard-faced female pictured alongside bore not the remotest resemblance to Aurore, and Dorn leafed on, feeling ashamed for even stopping.

He combed through a month of papers, and found nothing.

On the train to Edmonton, as it thundered under snowsheds and coiled through the beautiful foothills down upon the monotonous wheat plains, he read over the list Aurore had given him, and smiled at its oddity. "It's like her," he thought. It led off with an assortment of grub items such as any wise sourdough would have chosen; then a bathing suit size 34; then an outfit of woods clothing, fishing tackle, folding canoe, two white fluffy H. B. blankets, toilet articles, a dishpan and a box of chocolate candy.

When he walked out of the Edmonton station at ten o'clock the next morning Dorn ran into unexpected good luck—an old acquaintance, a bow-legged, chunky, bulldog chap padding up and down the curb yelling "ca-hab!" and trying to attract a fare toward his ramshackle, privately owned bus.

This Jerry Funk was salt of the earth. In his rapscallion days he had drunk beer tremendously and played stud poker atrociously and raised hell in divers minor ways, but since acquiring a wife and baby and bungalow across the river in Strathcona, he had sobered down and cut out the alley-pranks and plied his bus industriously.

"I need a car all day, Jerry," Dorn explained, after he shook hands with the chap. "Buying a lot of things, making fast tracks, catching a train back this evening."

Till midafternoon Jerry rattled him from shop to shop. The tonneau filled with bundles and Dorn's money dwindled to a thin Canadian nickel. Letting Jerry go home then, with instructions to come to a certain hotel for him at ten-thirty. Dorn phoned in the telegram and then sought a big jewelry shop.

The proprietor, summoned by the watch-case clerk, turned Aurore's barrette over and over in his hand.

"Yeas, id iss so-so valuable," he said cautiously, "if dot big stone iss a di'munt. I should vant to test id . . ."

He went back to a rear room. Dorn drummed on the watch-case, impatient, ill at ease. It was twenty minutes before Skull-Cap came out again.

Dorn was surprised when the jeweler counted him out a thousand dollars without haggling or asking references. He pocketed the money, which would be funds for Aurore when she left her wilderness sanctuary, and walked out of the shop.

From a doorway a man in a gray suit, with gray cap pulled low on his forehead, watched him till he was half a block away, then fell in behind and paced him.

After securing B-metre paper and a couple of other minor things which he needed in cartographing, Dorn went to a small, quiet hotel, took a room, bathed and shaved, ate supper, and then waited in his room till time Jerry should come.

A nameless uneasiness had grown upon him. The jeweler's long delay in examining the barrette, his readiness to buy a valuable article without a single reference, aroused Dorn's suspicions the more he thought back over the incident.

Aurore was so utterly dependent upon him! "They" were hunting for her, as she said. Along the Canadian National they had flung out a score of detectives who were hunting grimly, silently. Dorn thought of those former times in the lonely mountains when a wolf pack had shadowed him, filtering silently and unseen through dark balsam thickets.

The dust and sweat and garish bustle of the city oppressed Dorn as they never had done before. He felt hot and grimy, and his nerves were on a raw edge. He stepped to the window and stood looking out. In a rowan tree rearing up near the balcony a pair of sedate, monogamous robins were roosting beside their new-built nest. Westward over the tops of houses and trees he saw a distant range of hills, so far away that the limber pines crowning them were gossamer.

Aurore was probably sitting lonesome on the jutting boulder, watching the valley fill with purple shadows; watching the last touch of sun fade from the high pinnacles and linger a few moments longer among the clouds still higher. She was no intruder upon that solitude, but a part of it all. She belonged.

Responsibility for her rested heavily upon him. If her enemies should discover his connection with her, they would knock him out of the air with a hostile plane or else get him into their hands. The slightest suspicion would be fatal to her. If they shot him down it would mean her death. If they captured him, he would have to disclose where she was to save her life.

A chime in a distant part of the city began sounding. Dorn glanced at his watch. Ten o'clock. Jerry would be coming in a quarter of an hour. Turning from the window, he reached for his hat and coat.

Out of the corner of his eye he saw the door of his room flung suddenly open. A police sergeant, revolver in hand, stepped inside.

Four other officers, one of them jingling handcuffs, filed in behind the patrol leader. Last came a plain-clothes man in gray suit, gray cap.

The sergeant, a clean-cut young fellow, glanced sharply at Dorn's powerful physique, at his silent stern face, and stepped between Dorn and the window, his heavy revolver covering his prisoner.

He must have decided he was arresting a gentleman. He must have seen the anguished despair that swept over Dorn like a flood. For he nodded friendly enough and there was respect in his tones.

"Sorry to come bustling in, sir. Please don't make any ruckus. I got a squad here and a squad below. We wanted you bad."

CHAPTER VIII

ARRESTED! Those white-caps crowding into the door, that lanky sergeant, revolver in hand, were a thunder-yelp out of a clear sky to Dorn.

They did not need to tell him how his arrest had come about; in a flash he saw how Aurore's enemies, knowing she was penniless, had reckoned upon her trying to sell her only valuable possession. Even here in Edmonton, hundreds of miles from Titan Pass, the jewelry stores had been warned to look out for the costly barrette. Under pretense of testing the stone the proprietor had phoned detective headquarters, and an operative had shadowed him to the hotel.

But after a moment Dorn braced himself against the shock. In the same cold, stern way in which he would have met any disaster he stood tall and unstaggered under the chandelier now, facing his enemies, fighting down the desperation of a man trapped and cornered.

Stalling for time, for a few precious seconds to think, he spoke to the young sergeant.

"Before you take me in would you mind telling me what I'm being arrested for? It's a fellow's right, isn't it?"

The WAR BENEATH the WATERS

By Captain Paul Koenig

Commander of the "Deutschland"

The Deutschland, the First Submarine Merchantman, Makes Its Transatlantic Voyage

WAR! It's war! Like a flash of lightning from a cloudless sky this hurricane of news broke over the heads of the German people.

To us Germans the state of war meant first and foremost an exile from the whole neutral world. It meant a state of isolation from all in that world which had become precious to us in the course of the years. For the British blockade, growing ever closer as the days dragged along, ended all that contact and that commerce with the neutrals which in the beginning were possible. The individual had to adjust himself to such conditions as best he could. There was a feverish quest of ways and means to break through the ring of Britain's hunger blockade.

There was a way and there were means. These were indicated to us by the commerce and the shipping that for decades had comprised the closest ties between Bremen and the United States. In Bremen at any rate the action was suited to the word. Cautiously, and in an atmosphere of tensest silence, the scheme was undertaken. It consisted in foiling the British blockade with a submarine of commerce—a merchantman. I might say, that rode beneath the seas.

First of all were completed that great pair of commercial submarines, the Deutschland and the Bremen. Later on no less than six such submarines were to be put together.

Our war submarines made their way into the forbidden region established by Great Britain and France between them, there to make inroads into the holds of ships belonging to the enemy. Thus would the imports of war material be checked—that is, into the countries of the entente. But our own mission was far more peaceful. The safety of our boat and of its precious cargo must first and foremost be our care. All other considerations were to be sacrificed to this. It was therefore imperative that we keep out of the paths of all ships. We must be seen as seldom as possible.

I had formed a plan of navigation. I made up my mind before I had gained experience of the trip at all to avoid any ship that came in sight by the simple expedient of plunging below the surface. This I was determined to do before the ship got even a sight of us. Any ship at all might reasonably be taken for an enemy. It would require no more than a couple of minutes for shots to be fired and for grenades to smash our conning tower in.

When darkness involved us the watch grew keener. I heard a swift cry, "Light ahead!"

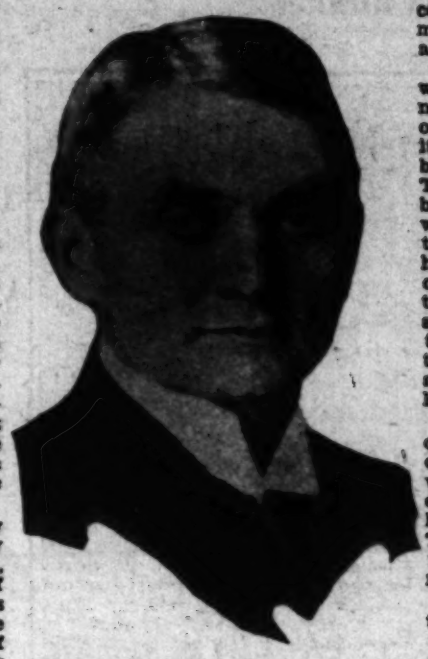
"What ship can it be?" I asked myself this question uneasily, but I did not pause to ponder it. I gave the order to dive at once. I stayed beneath the surface until daybreak. It must have been about four o'clock in the morning when we emerged upon the surface.

A bright, balmy day! I noted with all the more regret that a rough sea was running and that it was getting uglier and nastier. Toward evening the waters calmed a little. I saw the sun go down in a welter of flaming clouds of many colors. In the transparent twilight of this June evening I could make out to port far away a pair of masts. A funnel succeeded. The hull of a steamer was soon over the horizon.

I strove to make out her course. My purpose was to dive eventually so as to get out of her path. The course to which this steamship was keeping showed me plainly that she would come to no port. The fellow was making for empty space.

All this time the steamer had failed to detect us. She held to her course as true as ever and was now running more closely abaft. I made up my mind at once that I would not dive. Her course and ours being to exactly opposite points of the compass, we must soon get far apart.

Alarm! All at once the strange ship made a sharp turn and took a course straight toward us. I could now plainly see that the ship had made us out. I set my signals at once for my crew, "Alarm!" I got all ready for a dive below. I turned the submarine around forward the ship so that she lay athwart to the swell. In that position we could more readily plunge beneath.



Captain Paul Koenig, commander of the Deutschland, the first submarine merchantman.

No sooner had the neutral ship marked our turning and observed that we were diving than she turned about with what seemed very like a jerk. As we went below the surface I could see that she was assuming a zigzag course with all speed, her funnels belching the thickest black smoke.

Below the surface I turned at right angles, and did not emerge for the next two hours. Then I found the air cleared. In the southern heavens a moon was riding serenely. This rendered the gloaming of that summer night more transparent. As far as I could see the waters were bare—not a ship! The U Deutschland could go on her way unchallenged.

The enemy watch along the reaches of water to the North of Scotland I passed by quietly plunging below. Before us next lay the whole Atlantic Ocean. Here I could rely upon never coming across any other steamer.

I was anxious, just the same, not to be made out as a submarine by passing ships. To achieve this end we had prepared the happiest device for enabling a submarine to masquerate as a steamship that I ever saw. This device included a dummy funnel affixed with several wire rings to the periscope. Whenever the latter was lowered or raised the funnel was lowered and raised with it. For the conning-tower there was provided a cover of sail-cloth, upon which was painted the superstructure of a small freight steamer.

Before very long we were given an opportunity to test the verisimilitude of this theatrical property. Toward evening of a day, when the gleams of the sun still quivered above our heads, we saw ahead of us on the starboard side what was manifestly a ship under steam. Her course, if we did not alter our own, must lead straight across us, somewhat ahead, to be sure.

The dummy funnel I have mentioned was hoisted to the periscope bar, but not before we steered our course a little off. Although the funnel then reared itself with stately tallness, it seemed best to give it a more genuine aspect. This we contrived to do by filling the bottom of the funnel with cotton waste, which we then set afire. The conning-tower of the submarine disappeared behind the somewhat uncertain upper deck of paint. With the aid of an air pump the smouldering cotton waste was set in a blaze. The clouds of smoke that ought to have poured from the upper end of the sail-cloth funnel did not appear at all. Finally we poured tar on, and now left a glorious trail of smoke behind us.

The success of our efforts was disconcerting. The steamer quickly altered her course and made directly for us. This was certainly not my intention. I ordered our masts down immediately and had everything made ready for a plunge. The masquerade deck disappeared in a twinkling. Our "funnel" bent over at a rakish angle and collapsed.

No sooner was this perceived aboard the ship, which now immediately made us out to be a submarine, than she turned sharp about. The deep black smoke clouds shot forth by her funnels proved to us that she was getting out of her dangerous proximity to a submarine at the top of her speed.

Things had worked out just opposite of what we intended. Our artistic imitation of the apparatus of a steamship was intended to render us inconspicuous. It had actually drawn the attention of the real steamship to us. She evidently took us for a wreck, if not for a vessel in distress. Therefore she made straight for us with the best intentions! She saw to her dismay that she had been taken in by the deviltry of a submarine.

We steered our submarine over the so-called southern course until we reached the latitude of Baltimore. I then ordered a course westward.

Cloaked by the darkness of the night, I finally approached the lights of Cape Henry and Cape Charles. Barely awash and with lights well covered we voyaged on and on past the light-buoys and beacons. At last we entered American waters. It was just half-past eleven on the night of the 8th of July, and quite within the territorial waters of the United States, that I ordered my boat to the surface, her position lights all lit up. I made straight for the nearest pilot ship and then came to a stop, showing the customary blue flare.

A voice rang out from the pilot ship, "Where are you bound?"

My answer was no less ready, "Newport News!"

A boat came over the water quickly. The pilot lost no time in clambering up over the rounded belly of the U Deutschland. His words of greeting seemed to come from the depths of an overflowing human heart.

"I'll be damned! Here she is!"

He shook me most cordially by the hand. Nor did he dissemble his satisfaction. "I am the first American to greet the Deutschland in this country." He spoke with an emphasis as convincing as was his perfect sincerity.

The trip we made in such circumstances won us the sympathy of the American people, apparently without reference to their personal opinions or their influence politically or socially. The United States government took official cognisance of the problem we comprised for it—were we to be deemed a commercial vessel, a merchantman? I learned that the British Ambassador and the French Ambassador had both lodged protests with the Department of State at Washington. They took the position that, as a submarine, the Deutschland must be classified as a warship without more ado.

At the height of this hubbub three naval officers forming a commission of inquiry came over from Washington. They made a close investigation of the Deutschland—not a detail of her construction escaping them. They spent some hours in this task. I thought they would never weary of peering into corners and of thrusting their heads into nooks. Many a drop of sweat poured from their foreheads as they stood in the baking heat of motor compartments and machine-rooms. In the end these gentlemen made a report to the Navy department in which they certified the strictly commercial character of this submarine, Deutschland.

I must now, just the same, assume that vessels of the British fleet would undertake to prevent the departure of the Deutschland from Baltimore. In that harbour the Deutschland lay some 200 miles, roughly speaking, from the point at which she would emerge into the Atlantic from Chesapeake Bay. There the British cruisers, to say nothing of those of France, would be in a position to make trouble for us when we were getting out.

Persons in whose good faith I relied, as well as sea captains of coastwise vessels, warned us of the presence of foreign warships in the offing, just outside Chesapeake Bay. I took it for granted that the commanders of those enemy warships understood perfectly the sort of "mousetrap" the Deutschland was caught in. Feeling sure that they understood her predicament, they meant to see that she did not extricate herself.

As the day for our departure drew near the whole American press, and the American people as well seemed to become more and more occupied with one question—would the Deutschland be able to get out of Chesapeake Bay? I was told that in the clubs bets were laid. What the odds were I do not know.

We were well hemmed in by innumerable small steam vessels and motor boats when the Deutschland finally edged her course out toward waters navigable in the seaman's sense. Our immediate task was to give the slip to these craft. The wind rose and the sea rose with it and these conditions aided us tremendously. I saw with satisfaction as we pushed along that one boat after another had been left behind. One by one they began to turn back. A solitary vessel seemed determined to keep up with us. As the dusk grew into darkness even this persistent navigator gave us up and turned again home. I soon lost sight of it.

When the next morning dawned there was no ship to be seen, not even a small boat, with the exception of the tug Timmins, having us in tow.

We were now, I judged, some fifty miles or so from the point of departure out of Chesapeake Bay. We had made good time. Not until darkness favored us did I intend to break out.

The steady gleam of the beacon on Cape Henry shone forward. To port the lighthouse at Cape Charles hurled its shafts of light at short intervals. I steered southerly to the deep, southern channel affording access to the entrance of the bay. Then it was that to starboard I became aware of a searchlight quivering for a moment or two and then settling its steady gleams upon me. This blazing indiscretion on the part of ships is no unusual display along the American coast. Every coastwise vessel has a searchlight. It is thus enabled when navigating at night to detect buoys at river mouths, ships lying at anchor and other objects essential to note.

I blew the usual whistles. This was to

MIDNIGHT INTRUDERS

An Episode in the Married Life of Helen and Warren

By Mabel Herbert Urner
Creator of the "Helen and Warren" Characters

"NOW nobody drags me out tonight!" Warren shoved back his salad plate. "I'm all in—going to bed early."

"I know, dear—it's been a full week," Helen ringing for the maid. "But we haven't a thing to do tonight. Just a nice, quiet evening at home."

"Yes, and more of 'em from now on. I'm fed up with parties. Not going anywhere nor having anybody for a month!"

"Emma, you can bring the dessert. Oh, what can that be?"

Dropping her napkin with a nervous premonition. Darting to the library phone.

"Hello . . . Yes, who is this? . . . . Oh, Nita! Why, when did you get in? . . . No, we're going to be home . . . Of course, come right up."

Flying back to the dining-room with a flurried:

"Nita Marsh! In town for a few days. I haven't seen her for ages—"

"Huh, haven't missed much," dispatching his pineapple whip.

"She'll be up in half an hour. Oh, I must fix the library—"

"Why doll up for her? How about a repeat on this goo? What's that? Now, I don't rush my dinner for anybody. Here, aren't you having coffee?"

"No, I can't!" racing into the pantry for the vacuum cleaner.

No time to clear up before dinner—the seamstress had stayed too late. The library rugs strewn with threads, pins, scraps.

"Good grief, general housecleaning?" Warren sauntered in with his after-dinner cigar. "Fine hour of the night!"

"Dear, take this out," shutting off the humming motor. "I have to dress."

"Huh, not goin' to the opera," grumblingly dragging out the vacuum.

Helen dashing to the bedroom. Slipping into her printed chiffon. Doing her hair.

"What's wrong with WQP?" Warren at the radio when she reappeared.

"I couldn't get it this afternoon, either," fluffing the couch pillows.

" . . . softly, my little one, sleep!" a shrill wail from the loud speaker.

"You'll sleep, all right!" savagely twirling the dial. "Wish I could do as much. Why in blazes she had to pick on tonight—"

"Dear, she so rarely comes," propitiatingly. "I'll fix some refreshments—"

"Good idea," disgustedly switching off the radio. "Need some nourishment to survive a session of her gab!"

Out to the kitchen. The amber glasses, that gift chartreuse, and some wafers.

"Dear, it's nine o'clock!" setting the tray on the library table. "No, Pussy Purr-Mew, nothing for you! She should've been here long ago."

"After rushin' my dinner!" seizing a wafer. "Hope she doesn't turn up."

Helen slitting the wrapper of a just-arrived magazine. Skimming through an implausible detective story when again the phone rang.

" . . . Why, what's been keeping you? . . . Oh! . . No, it's quite all right."

"Not coming?" Warren's hopeful over-his-book glance.

"Yes, right away. Had dinner with some friends—she's bringing them, too."

"The devil she is!" explosively. "That means an all-night party."

Memories of their small-town girlhood. Pranks engineered by Nita.

Always gay, daring—a little ahead of the times. A devotee of the latest slang, the latest styles, the latest fads.

And forever dashing madly about! The go-places-and-do-things mania—

"Well, this's the limit!" Warren hurled down his book. "I'm going to bed! Can't, eh?" belligerently. "Who's goin' to stop me?"

"Oh, think how it'll look! Dear, wait just ten minutes longer."

"Waited long enough!" shaking her off. "You sit up till morning if you want. I'm turning in right now!"

But he had hardly slammed into the bedroom, when again the telephone! A strident clamor on the late-night stillness.

"Hello, Nita! . . . Oh! . . . Oh, no, of course not!"

Flying into the bedroom. Warren arms-over-head—peeling off his shirt.

"Quick—quick!" breathlessly. "They're downstairs! Don't let her think—"

"Got her nerve—hornin' in at this hour!" his glare emerged from the swathing shirt. "What does she take us for—loafers like her? I got to work tomorrow."

"Hurry!" handing him his thrown-on-a-chair vest. "She asked if we'd gone to bed—as if it was a joke!"

"Why didn't you tell her I had?" he rumbled. "Give me that coat."

"Brush your hair!" as the bell shrilled. "It's all on end. And come right in—"

Boisterous chatter as she opened the door. Giggles, laughter—

Just one couple with Nita. A lanky, goggled youth and a sleekly blond girl. All three in evening dress.

Facetious introductions. Trailing into the library when Warren appeared.

"Fine hour to blow in!" his curt greeting. "Regular night-owls—"

"Why, it's early!" Nita flopped on the couch. "The night's just starting."

"But what a start?" shrilled the blond. "Johnny's had us in every speakeasy in the Village. I lost track after the twentieth!"

"You know you can't count over ten!" Nita lighting a cigarette with unsteady fingers. "How have you been, Helen, dear? You never change! Always the perfect housewife!"

"No!" roared Johnny. "Ain't no such animal—not any more! Say you aren't!"

Helen's embarrassed crimson. A swift glance at Warren. His grim contempt—

He would say something—his disastrous bluntness. Trying to send him a make-the-best-of-it signal.

"Come here, Kitty!" the blond clutched the protesting Persian to her white fur collar. "Meet a first cousin of yours—Ow—ow!"

"Did she scratch you? Oh, I'm sorry! She doesn't like strangers—"

Pussy Purr-Mew seeking a piano-top refuge. Solacing her outraged dignity with slit-eyed disdain.

"Swanky superdyne," the young man bending over the radio. "Eleven-thirty—time for Freddie Filet's Hot Hoofers. How do I get WGM, old man?"

"Sixty-four," growled Warren, shrugging free from his shoulder clap.

Tuned in. A blatant saxophone introducing the full-band syncopation.

Nita executing a swaying solo. Seizing Warren's arm.

"Dance with me, big boy! Come on, don't be a pain!" trying to swing him around. Then, at his unmovable stolidity, "My dear, how can you put up with that old bear? He's positively medieval—"

Helen straining for a playful retort. But distracted by the other couple—shuffling madly over the rugs. Perilously near that floor lamp—

"You two come along. Let's all make whoopee!"

"Count us out," gruffed Warren. "I've got to work tomorrow."

"Work?" feigned surprise. "What does that mean? Don't know that word!"

"That's the kind the dictionary stars—obsolete! Archaic—Now, let's toddle," urged Johnny. "You're stepping out with us!"

"Oh, we're not dressed!" evaded Helen. "And it's so late—"

"Late? How naive!" Nita condescending. "Any decent place is dead before two. Come on, you need a little dissipation. If Warren saw some other men rush you—he wouldn't be such a grouch!"

"I wouldn't, eh? Well, you run along without us."

"What a wet smack you turned out!" pouted Nita, lighting another cigarette.

"Know what's wrong with you?" Johnny leaning forward with exaggerated gravity. "Too many inbitions—inhibitions, that's the word! What you ought to—woy, is this a bottle that I see before me?"

Ambling to the table with the glimmering tray.

"Huh, haven't you seen enough bottles for one night?" grumped Warren.

"Oh!" a shriek from Nita. "Oh, look what I've done!"

A charred smudge on the antique velvet pillow!

"Why, it—it's all right," trying not to show her resentment.

"Oh, you're an angel, Helen! Sure you're not angry?" flinging apologetic arms about her. "Didn't I tell you she was an angel? That for me?"

"Here's to crime!" Johnny flourishing his tiny glass.

More inane quips, more laughter, and at last they started off.

"Home to Harlem!" still shrieking, they piled into the elevator.

The boy's open-mouthed astonishment as he closed the grilled door.

"Oh, I know the Morleys heard!" quivered Helen, glancing at the across-the-hall door. "What will they think?"

"Know what I think!" Warren's savage explosion. "Of all the pie-eyed performances—your precious Nita and her prize imbeciles!"

"My lovely pillow!" back to the library with damage-verifying haste. "That old velvet I got in Florence—yes, burnt through!"

"Huh, lucky those house-wreckers didn't smash the whole place. Fallin' in here at midnight—all lit up! Her idea of bein' modern!"

Viciously jerking off his coat, he snorted into the bedroom.

"Medieval, am I? Hate to tell her what I think she is! Well, that settles Nita. Last time she crashes this joint with her gang of morons—or without 'em!"

GOLDEN TEMPTATIONS

By
Alma Whitaker

MIND you, I should enjoy paying a larger income tax, at that. It must be dazzling to have the commissions rolling in and be able to patronize one's neighbors.

Then, again, my might-have-been victims do not necessarily appreciate my noble abstentions.

For instance, there was the little lady who made home-made candy. She bustled into the office all beaming. Now she had thought of me, everything would be all right. It seemed that buyers for home-made candies were a little slow in arriving. But I met so many people . . . especially the picture stars. If I would give her a letter of introduction to all the nice rich people I knew, recommending her candy, she would not only give me one box right there, but would promise me another by and by.

She seemed so disgusted with me when I passed up this dazzling opportunity. So absurd of me to say I didn't want to make myself that kind of a nuisance. Why, all those movie stars would just be grateful to me for introducing them to such wonderful candy.

Then there was the fellow who represented a cigarette firm. I was to give him a list of all the women I knew that smoked and let him use my name. If I didn't want to take my pay out in cigarettes, he would pay me five per cent on all sales. I could trust him, he assured me. Several high-society dames were doing business for him along those lines. You should have seen the contempt he bestowed upon me when I said I thought smoking was vulgar and that I would not for worlds divulge the names of the poor benighted females I knew who indulged the nasty habit.

Or again there was the dear old lady who had decided to sell her heirlooms. She thought possibly Mary Pickford or Greta Garbo would just adore those bits of old lace. And wasn't that old quilt lovely? She would let it go for a couple of hundred dollars and I could have all I could sell it for over that. As for the lace, well . . . suppose we said one hundred dollars for that and if I couldn't get more for it, she'd give me five dollars for myself. Oh, yes, and would I give her a letter to Mr. Huntington, she rather thought he might like an old Bible that had been in the family for three generations. Some one had told her it was worth five hundred dollars at the very least. If I gave her the letter, did I feel I would be entitled to a commission on that if he bought it?

A big bundle arrived one week, full of crewel-work pillow tops. The writer said she lived in the mountains, so she was trusting me to sell them for her. I could lay them around my room and sell them to all my visitors. She thought ten dollars apiece would be a fair price . . . with maybe fifty cents a time for myself. We were quite touchy, I am ashamed to say, when we had to buy wrapping paper and stand in line at the postoffice to send them back. Think of it, I might have lost a dozen friends and made six dollars on that enterprise!

Molly, who is an ex-club president, has undertaken a "position" with a bank which had decided it wanted women's accounts. So Molly promptly thought of me. When I was attending all these clubs and social affairs, wouldn't it be nice if I just dropped a word or two about the advantages of banking at that bank? There were all sorts of nice little things she could do for me, she said, if I secured her a nice lot of women customers. For instance, she would invite me up to her mountain cabin some time and I needn't take a thing . . . most of her guests took up things for lunch . . . a nice ham or something like that, but I should be welcome with naught but my overnight bag . . . if . . .

The lady who wanted me to help her sell cemetery lots was even more generous. She would present me with a whole cemetery lot big enough for my entire family, if I helped her sell six cemetery lots in the prettiest, snuggiest burial ground in all California. Perhaps I should have at least tried to acquire that cemetery lot . . . after all, I may be sorry if we all die paupers and have to be cremated by the city.

I passed up another precious chance when I failed to be properly enthusiastic about the lady who took children's portraits. If I would just make a few nice rich people let her take pictures of their children . . . without any obligation whatever, but, of course, they usually did order a couple of dozen after . . . she would pay me fifteen per cent on all the trade I brought her. Of course, if they didn't happen to order any . . . well, what did I think? Would I still expect any commission? I just knew it would be ungenteel of me to expect any under those circumstances, but I felt in a vulgar mood and said I would, and that I thought I ought to get fifty per cent in any case. This worried her a trifle . . . but it was most awkward when she agreed . . . since, of course, we could just put the price up, couldn't we? Later we parted a trifle coldly . . . I think she really wanted some one more genteel.

Lots of real estate men have offered to augment my income handsomely. All I have to do is to tip them off when any of the motion-picture stars begin to feel like acquiring a little nest, or blossoming out into greater glory. They will do the rest . . . and I can expect anything from one hundred to five thousand dollars when they make a deal. It is mostly the hapless motion-picture people I am to help sell things to. If they only knew it, they are really indebted to me for not craving these dazzling commissions. But, as I always tell these enterprising gentlemen, I simply wouldn't know how to be a millionaire. It wouldn't suit my economic style at all. I am the type that gets enormous swank out of making five dollars go as far as anyone else's twenty.

Again there was the nice bumptious gentleman who runs a travel bureau. I was to talk up travel at parties, find out who could afford to travel and might possibly be induced to travel, and then he would pop in and sell them a trip around the world. For this service he would give me ten dollars on every five hundred dollars' worth he sold. On the other hand, if I directed people to him who intended to travel anyway . . . and make sure they mentioned my name when buying their tickets . . . he would raise the ante to ten per cent. I resisted this sumptuous temptation, feeling that my popularity would not stand the test . . . but oh, I am suspicious of every woman that begins talking up travel to me these days.

All the same I was flattered to death when one firm wanted me to talk up complexion creams and corral customers for beauty treatments. I did not risk mentioning it, but they must have felt my complexion would be a good advertisement for them. However, I resisted that one, too—in case the prospective customers didn't happen to feel as the firm did about it.

One is so flattered to be regarded as a good salesman. One hates to undeceive these enterprising dears. It's never any use assuring them that one doesn't happen to wish to make one's self that kind of a nuisance among one's friends. They usually suspect one of ulterior motives in declining . . . maybe one is hooked up with some other firm.

So difficult to explain that one despises amateur selling and back-door methods. When I'm a salesman I want to be a professional and get all there is in it. Otherwise, I insist upon remaining among the victims. All the same, I do envy that chap that sold me that stock on the very day the market broke . . . genius, genius!

With the Poets

That Is Life

To urge one on to nobler, better deeds;
To furnish wholesome food on which thought feeds;
To sow and harvest grain instead of weeds,
That is life.

To help a neighbor in his needful days;
To tide him over rough and stormy ways;
Calls forth no need for special song of praise,
That is life.

To ever lift instead of dragging down;
To learn to laugh and smile instead of frown;
That brings one honest fame and rich renown,
That is life.

He who can lighten burdens, pains and woes;
Spread cheer and sunshine everywhere he goes;
Will make a path that ever brighter grows,
That is life.

Heights and Depths

There is a time in every human life
When everything material fades away;
The soul goes on beyond the constant strife
That marks the dawning of each fleeting day.
The world of mortals changes every hour,
The past is like the visions of our dreams;
With hope to magnify the present's power
Replete with happiness the future seems.
If disappointment comes instead of joy,
If sorrow lingers in our lonely hearts,
If what we thought was gold is but alloy,
If from our sky the star of hope departs,
This world and all it holds may disappear,
The heights and depths preclude all doubt and fear.

"Candles of the Lord"

Over the hills in the summer,
Far as the eye can see,
The tall white yuccas are blooming,
Stately and sweet and free.

"Candles of God," they call them,
These waxy blooming trees,
Worshiping Him on the hilltops,
Bowing in every breeze.

Carrying God's own message,
His tender loving word,
Pointing the way to heaven,
The "Candles of the Lord."

"This," said the young doctor severely, "is pure impertinence. I will speak to her."

By that time the sumptuous young woman, referred to in the press as a leader of the younger set, had become a "case" in the accident ward of a city hospital. There was nothing now to distinguish her from her nineteen fellow-sufferers in the long ward, save a pair of lively blue eyes. She saw the doctor swinging down the ward and her eyes narrowed.

He drew out the little white chair, sat down and stared thoughtfully at her. "Evidently you're feeling better."

"I feel grand," she said, "and the soup was divine. Only they forgot to bring the other courses."

"Soup," he told her, "was all you were supposed to have. Are you still hungry?"

"Have you ever lived on ice cream sodas for three days?"

He bent forward. "May I ask why you did it? Miss Furness, who is an observing woman—she has to be—tells me that most of your—er—things had Paris labels on them. Our wards are reserved for those who cannot afford to pay for medical attendance."

"Then there must be a bed here with my initials on it," she said.

His lean cheek bones rosied. "Moreover, every patient who comes into this hospital is required to supply us with certain facts concerning himself, if it is possible for him to do so."

"And if it isn't possible," Teddy asked earnestly, "what happens? You couldn't turn me out, you know—in this fez."

He stood up.

"Very well, if you persist in preserving this mystery. But if you are going to accept the hospitality of this institution I expect you to conduct yourself like any other ward patient."

She folded her hands demurely across her breast. "Yessir. I haven't had much experience—I mean, at being a charity case, but I'm naturally quick at picking up little things like that."

The doctor told the interested Miss Furness, "I can't make head or tail of her."

"I'm sure," the nurse said, "she's some wealthy young society girl who's run away from home—and she's certainly plucky."

"She's a flippant, spoiled little brat," he corrected her and turned away, whirled back impatiently. "I don't like to think of her in there, somehow."

"We'll try to make her comfortable, doctor," Miss Furness promised meekly.

And so they did, so far as that slight and weary young body was concerned. But if pain and depression threatened to engulf her she was careful not to let the spic and span young doctor see it.

Twice more, before the lights were dimmed for the night, he made the rounds of the ward. She watched him, grave, immaculate, moving from bed to bed. Noted, with a malicious twinkle, the respectful deference of the nurse at his elbow, the adoring eyes with which the patients followed him.

When he paused beside her bed and asked her, "Well, how's our nameless patient tonight?" she gave him a simpering smile and said, "Better, thank you, doctor," in blatant imitation of the old lady with the broken hip in the next bed.

But it was wasted effort for he nodded and passed on. The second time she was more successful. She opened fire with, "It must be wonderful to be so popular."

"It's not unpleasant," he said cheerfully, "But I've no doubt you know the sensation, yourself."

"What makes you think so?"

"Because there are people in the world who admire pert, self-willed young women," he said dryly.

She grinned up at him. "Well, that makes us love all." She sniffed. "Don't I smell smoke."

"Probably. They're building up the fire," he told her and moved away. "Good night. Better go to sleep."

In the ever-deepening silence, an intolerable sense of desolation settled upon her. She fought it hardily, fought it in the end by planning the annihilation of the snubby young doctor. But when at last she fell asleep, the first person to walk into her dreams was that objectionable creature.

"It's an excellent thing," he was confiding to her, "to smoke out pain. It's my own discovery and especially good for pains in the head if the patient inhales it."

"But it's terribly choky," she objected. Still she was admiring him enormously, wanting to please him and so she inhaled deeply. "But it is choky."

"Choky," she repeated and opened her eyes. Opened them to a ward full of smoke shot through with startled cries of "Fire!" "Doctor!" "Nurse!"

She tumbled out of bed, slid her feet into the list slippers beside and flew to the corridor. But what had been the corridor, was now a dense billowing sea of smoke. Somewhere beyond it there were sounds, sounds that sent her shrinking back in involuntary horror. The next instant she had drawn the heavy doors to and turned.

The smoke-filled ward was like a dim tomb that had given up its demented dead. White figures were wavering across the floor, misshapen limbs dragged themselves on all fours from bed to bed. But many, like the old lady with the broken hip who was telling her beads in a shrill wail, were helpless to move. It was from these that reiterant cry came with blood-curdling despair—"Fire!"

Teddy Lysle took in the scene, while little icy rills of sweat trickled down her spine. Then she lifted her voice. "Fire, your granny! Don't be silly! Didn't any of you ever hear of a chimney smoking before? Aren't you ashamed of yourselves to behave like this? Hop back to bed, now, all of you! I'm going for the doctor and if he sees you like this won't you be sorry!"

Though they continued to mumble their fears, she had the satisfaction of seeing them make for their beds as she went—not too swiftly—the length of the ward to the opposite corridor. Here she found no smoke, no signs of life. But the clamor of an unleashed panic slamming doors, voices sharp with sudden terror. She hesitated there uncertainly and, around a bend of the long corridor a figure came running. The spic-and-span young doctor, coatless, collarless. She gathered up the too-long folds of the coarse nightgown and trotted off to meet him.

"Better get out," he said without stopping. "Stairs are at the end of the hall. Better take a blanket to wrap around you. Catch cold if you don't."

"Listen!" She clutched his arm. "Is it a bad fire? Is there any danger? Half of those poor things in there can't walk, can they? And they're scared stiff."

"No danger," he panted, "if they don't lose their heads before I get 'em out."

"You and who else?" she demanded. "Where's everybody, anyway? All the nurses and—"

"Busy in the other wing. It's worse there." He stopped short, glanced up and down the deserted corridor. "Got to find a stretcher somewhere."

"I'll hold the fort while you're looking for it," she said. "And how about getting the others started—the ones who can walk?"

"Why, you—you'd better be getting out yourself, child."

"Listen," she said impatiently. "I can navigate, they can't. Go bring on the stretcher."

She went back into the ward and addressed those nineteen expectant beds. "The doctor says that all of you who can walk, are to get up and put on your bathrobes and—"

"It's fire!" a shrill scream interrupted her. "It's—"

"And the next person that says 'fire,'" she announced coldly, "is going to wish it wasn't anything but fire that hit her. I mean it! Don't you suppose if there was any danger, I'd be getting out myself?"

When the doctor returned, wheeling his grim carryall, he found the accident ward in the process of hurried but orderly evacuation. Whatever ominous sounds might have penetrated here, were drowned out by the cheerful prattle of his nameless patient. "Don't forget to put the cat out, girls! Your slippers are parked under the bed, sister. Better put 'em on 'cause we have to walk—the rest of you people are in luck to have a buggy ride. Here's poppa with the taxi!"

She was wrapping up the old lady with the broken hip whom hope and terror had rendered mute. She grinned across her lumpy handiwork at him. "Aren't we good?"

He nodded. "But it's going to be a slow business. The damned elevator boy has bolted."

"Well, I can run a dumb waiter," she said, "and I guess an elevator's not much more complicated."

"Child, you couldn't—"

But she could and did. The mechanics of the elevator proved simple enough but, being a hospital elevator, it was not to be hurried. Eight frightened, blubbering women made that first trip from the inferno of the third floor to the chaos of the first—and safety. There was not a moment during that slow descent, nor those that followed, when panic did not threaten to turn that small cubicle into a miniature madhouse. But Teddy Lysle held it at bay.

"Going down, ladies. Don't crowd. Second floor—waffle irons, union suits and wooden legs. Teething rings second aisle over, madam. Watch your step!"

The real battle had been fought before the fire engines came clanging to the rescue, and one of its most able generals was the outlandish little figure at the lever of one of the elevators. Long after the accident ward had been cleared she continued at her post. Her voice rasped huskily but did not falter until the last bed had been emptied and stronger hands relieved her.

After that she was only dimly conscious of being gently propelled through a tumult of hurrying figures and excited voices, of coming slowly to life in a small, quiet room before a blazing fire with a steaming cup of coffee in her hand. It was not until she saw the bottom of her cup that she smiled across at the young doctor.

"More?" he asked. She shook her head. "Feel better?"

"I feel grand. This your place?" He nodded. She looked down at the great fuzzy overcoat that enveloped her. "This your coat?" He nodded again. She grinned. "Regular old man voila himself, aren't you?"

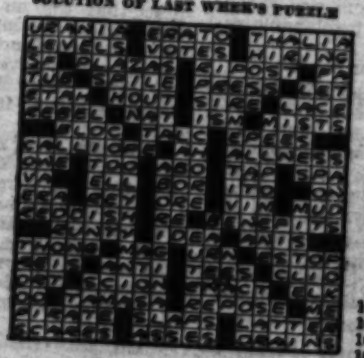
SOLUTION OF LAST WEEK'S PUZZLE



GOLDEN TEMPTATIONS

MIND you, I should enjoy paying a larger income tax, at that. It must be dazzling to have the commissions rolling in and be able to patronize one's neighbors.

Then, again, my weight-have-been victims do not necessarily appreciate my noble abstentions.

For instance, there was the little lady who made home-made candy. She bustled into the office all beaming. Now she had thought of me, everything would be all right. It seemed that buyers for

This doesn't include the vast number of people who have offered me fifty per cent to sell scenarios for them. I should be bursting with wealth if I had sold all those suggested . . . and incidentally should be responsible for a lot of low-grade entertainment.

One is so flattered to be regarded as a good salesman. One hates to undeceive those enterprising dears. It's never any use assuring them that one doesn't happen to wish to make one's self that kind of a nuisance among one's friends.

"FIFTY on the blue!"

"Twenty up, Ted!"

"Oil your heel, baby!"

Teddy Lysle oiled her heel and sprinted nimbly round the table, barricaded herself behind a high backed chair and warned her pursuer:

"Lay off, Bob. This isn't the truck drivers' annual picnic!"

It was when she reached the door that the rug slipped on the polished floor and she flung out a hand for support.

The tumult that followed was a blend of shrieks, of crashing marble, the thump of a heavy pedestal. Bob Newton cried, panting:

"Oh, I say, I'm sorry! Are you hurt, Ted?"

She scrambled up, shaking her brief chiffon skirt into place.

"No—but look! Dad's Psyche!"

"What was it, Ted? Something rare?"

"Oh, yes—I mean—" then she remembered that they were her guests and laughed lightly. "It's nothing—don't do that, Bob," for he was pawing contritely among the broken bits of marble, "you'll slay yourself. Storm'll assemble the lady."

The crash had brought the butler and now he stooped and began, imperturbably, to gather up the shattered statue. They concentrated on him in uneasy silence, and Ted's eyes, drawn by some chilly instinct, were the first to see her father framed in the open doorway.

"Any bones broken?" he asked quietly.

"Only Psyche's," Teddy told him. "I knocked her over accidentally, Dad. I—I'm sorry as the deuce."

But her apology was delivered to an empty doorway.

It was plain that the bloom was off the party. Plainer still when, a little before twelve, the guests trooped off to the country club dance without their hostess.

The horror that had gripped her at sight of the broken Psyche possessed her again, and for the first time in her life she was afraid. Afraid of her father as he had looked with his eyes on that empty pedestal.

She knocked softly on the library door before going in. He was at his desk and on the blotting pad were the remains of the mutilated Psyche. He looked up at her sharply.

"Well!"

"I—you know I'm going up to the Maddens' camp tomorrow for a week, so I—I thought I'd pop in and say goodby."

"Is that all you have to say?"

"No, dad. I—I'm terribly sorry about the Psyche. I—you see, Bob Newton had been ragging me and something I said peeved him and the others dared him to —I mean I was running and I happened to slip and—well, I bumped into it and then I—I'm awfully sorry, dad."

"You were running," he repeated and his eyes hardened "and, I take it, a young man was chasing you. I was under the impression that you were giving a dinner party. You should have told me that you were going to have a—a tournament and I'd have had Storm clear the rooms."

She was on the defensive at once. "It was just an accident. It might have happened to anybody and I—I'm willing to pay for it."

"It was an accident," he said, "that could never have happened in a company of ladies and gentlemen. That lovely thing had the misfortune to be in your way tonight and so you knocked it over."

"No, that wasn't—"

"You rode roughshod over it as you do everything else that happens to interfere with your idea of a 'good time'—conventions, modesty, my wishes, your mother's memory."

He was touching a familiar theme there and she said impatiently:

"Ohmygosh! All that again!"

"All that, yes!" he cried. "It's all of a piece, my dear. You knew that your mother and I bought that little statue on our wedding trip and that I valued it more than anything else for that reason. But you couldn't even respect that sentiment."

"I told you it was an—"

"And then you offer to pay for it!"

"I guess I could buy another one, couldn't I?"

He bent toward her, said abruptly. "You could, but what with?"

Her eyes spread in genuine surprise. "Why out of my—why with my own—"

"With the money that I allow you," he finished quietly. Then the startled wonder in her blue eyes softened him a little. "I'm merely pointing that out to you, Ted, to give you a clearer picture of yourself. You're no more able to pay for this than for any of the other things you've done to hurt me." He sighed. "Not that I expect it. Everything I've done and made since your mother died has been for you and I don't begrudge it. But don't you think you owe me something in return?" She stared at him. "Take it from a business point of view, child. What would you do without me—if anything happened to me or our money?"

"I—I don't know. I never thought about it."

"You'd starve in a week, my dear."

"Oh, would I?"

"In a week," he repeated and slumped back in his chair as though he were suddenly very tired. "In order not to you'd have to have something more marketable than a talent for enjoying yourself. Not that you need worry, only it may make you realize that you owe me something, Ted. And another time don't make matters worse by offering to pay for your 'accidents' unless you're able to."

Teddy Lysle went up to her room with her blue eyes smoldering and the tips of her ears burning from the impact of that last remark. It was the first time she had ever emerged from one of their not infrequent scenes without having fired the last shot. But that was because she had been stricken dumb by the blasting discovery that her independence was built on a false basis. By the appalling possibility that there could be any situation in life to which she had not proved herself equal.

This was by no means the reaction her father had expected his words to produce. He may have hoped to arouse in her a dormant filial conscience. What he did was to make the purchase of a new Psyche the only possible restorative for her wounded pride.

And she had, fortunately, an entire, unhampered week to do it in. Not that she expected it to take that long. As she told Benny Raskin the next morning, when he expressed surprise at seeing her in New York.

"I'm really on my way to the Maddens' camp, but I had a little business in town first."

"Which makes it grand for me," Benny said. "You're looking like a million dollars."

Benny liked his friends to look like a million dollars. And most of them did. Benny's place was one of those chummy little restaurants whose clientele find it convenient to cultivate the restaurateur. As witness Teddy Lysle comfortably seated in his private office.

"Maybe," she admitted, "but I need some, just the samey—I mean dollars." She hitched forward in her chair. "Listen, Benny, how do you go about making money? You've done it so you ought to know."

"Hey?" said Benny blankly. "Make money?"

She nodded. "You see I've decided to do it—I mean really make some myself."

He was staring at her through his cigarette smoke. "But what the helm! You mean you want a job?"

"Of course not. I told you I had to get up to Deet Madden's. I just want to make a little money before I go, that's all."

"Oh, that's all, is it?"

"Yes. I—I need some for—for something, and then I just want to prove that I can do it. I mean, that I wouldn't starve if I went on my own, see?"

"Just want to show 'em, eh?" said Benny. "Well, if I was you, I wouldn't bother. I'd just be satisfied with knowing that I could and run along to my party."

She looked her contempt at the suggestion. "I thought you might have an idea, but if—"

"I have," he cried suddenly. "Marry it. Marry me."

"Don't be idiotic, Benny."

"Well, if you won't marry me, come along and lunch with me and I'll try to think of something easier."

And so she lunched with Benny, but without his finding anything more fruitful to offer in the way of suggestions.

"Unless you hock something. You ought to get enough on that watch for this dark secret of yours."

"But that wouldn't be making it," she pointed out. "And I'm not going home—or anywhere else—till I've made some money."

He rubbed his chin, ruminating. "All right. How much capital you got?"

She opened her purse, produced a few crumpled bills. "And I'm going to pay this back—from what I make—because I'm on my own, Benny, absolutely on my own—for a week, anyway." She challenged him. "Don't you think I can do it?"

"Sure. Only how? To make money you got to have capital or else you got to find out what your marketable talents are and get somebody interested enough to bid on 'em, see?"

When she left him, she decided that Benny had not been very helpful, that she had better take her problem to some one more prolific of ideas. To Hal Fenn, perhaps, who had made a fortune on the stock market in a day. Or to Bentley Gorman, who had done equally exciting things in automobiles. But both Hal and Bentley had left their offices when she telephoned them and so she put in a long-distance call for the Madden camp. She told Deet that she was in town and she guessed the party would have to limp along without its other crutch—for a day or two. Then she taxied to a hotel feeling tremendously independent, the only one of her crowd in town and on her own—absolutely.

New York blew hot and cold, like a fickle lover, those early September days. On the fourth after her arrival, it turned chilly, very chilly as the young hotel clerk remarked when she passed his desk.

"Unusually cold," he said. "Oh, by the way, I was just going to send this up but since you're here—"

"A letter!" she cried. "But it can't be for me."

He wished it had been a letter. He wished it were not the custom of the hotel to present biweekly accounts to those of its guests who possessed no more visible collateral than one smallish suit case.

She was definitely cold when she reached her room and looked at the bill. It seemed an enormous bill for such a small room in such a modest little hotel. She emptied her purse to find that its yield was ten dollars short of the amount of the bill.

The discovery was like a smart tap on the head of a sleeper. It served to arouse Teddy Lysle from what, she began to suspect, had been a buoyant dream of four days' duration. Both Bob and Harry had thought it a great idea for her to show the world that she could do something besides get her picture in the What-Society-is-Doing column. They had lunched and matineed her and nounced coldly, "is going to wish it wasn't anything but if there was any danger, I'd be getting out myself?"

Bill Ferrant had called her noble and driven her out to see some air stunts. But somehow they hadn't gotten anywhere.

It was the bill that made this clear. Perhaps she had not chosen, the best method of launching a career of independence. She had heard that one's friends were not always reliable in a crisis. It might be better to consult a stranger, some one who made a specialty of finding and exploiting a client's marketable talents. But in the meantime there was the bill to consider—and dinner. She got up briskly.

She was thinking of the pleasant young clerk when she repaired her lips and redusted her small nose. But when she went downstairs, it was to find an elderly gentleman behind the desk. A melancholy creature so steeped in pessimism that her best smile failed to dispel it. She opened her purse and plunged into her prearranged speech:

"I don't happen to have that much cash with me, so I thought I'd give you this on account—and I'll have the rest in a—in a day or so, if that will be all right."

Just how short of "all right" the melancholy gentleman thought this arrangement, was painfully obvious from his expression as he raked in the bills. From the hesitant manner in which he wrote her a receipt. From the doubtful voice in which he said, "Thank you!"

She had meant to go straight on into the dining-room, but the melancholy man's eyes were upon her. And so she turned and went briskly out through the swinging doors.

She had walked nearly an hour before it occurred to her to count the change she had thought too insignificant to add to the bills she had given the melancholy man. There was nearly a dollar in her purse. Enough for a modest dinner. But her joy in this discovery was only momentary, for if she dined she would indeed be penniless. Being penniless had a romantic sound, but it might prove a handicap. She closed her purse and made for the nearest drug store. On a high stool before a sticky counter, she dined on a chocolate soda.

The manager of the Universal Employment Agency prided himself on his sagacity. Therefore, when he saw Teddy Lysle poised uncertainly in the middle of his office, he had already made a mental list of his most desirable country house servants before he approached her. He was a plump, oily little man and he smiled with oily deference upon this smart beauty who connoted visions of Paris couturiers and fashionable resorts.

"And what can I do for you?"

"Why, I—I just happened to be passing and I saw your posters downstairs—I mean about help wanted and so I thought I'd ask you—I mean about going into business."

She would never know how deeply she had offended him. "Oh!" he said and his smile vanished. "Well, take a chair."

The oily man said shortly, "Name?" She gave it. "Address?" She gave that of the little hotel. "What's your line?"

"My—I beg your pardon?"

"Your line," he repeated. "What do you do? Stenography?"

"Well, no," she confessed. "I never tried that and anyway isn't it terribly confining?"

He stared at her. "Well, what do you—let's have a look at your references."

She smiled and shook her head. "I haven't any."

"Huh? What happened at your last place? Get the sack?"

"No. You see I've never been in business before and I haven't quite made up my mind what I would do. I thought I'd ask your advice. I want to make some money rather quickly, and I thought you might have some special work. I mean something like organizing and running something. I've been thinking it over and I'm pretty good at things like that—executive things. I was chairman of the club fete for the hospital fund this year and we made a lot of money and everybody said—"

He knew her now for one of his pet antipathies—a society dame out slumming.

"Listen, miss," he said. "I been in this business for twenty years and I never yet had a call for anybody to run a club feet."

"But I don't mean—"

"I know what you mean, miss. You mean you might consider something else—like hiring out to the Mayor for a few hours to tell him how to run the city." She flushed angrily but his eyes were merry. "Listen, miss! I've heard of girls like you gettin' bored with high life and deciding to show the world what was wrong with it. But I never heard of 'em doing it, see?"

He grinned at her good humoredly and to her surprise, instead of going—as she had meant to do—she found herself saying desperately, "I know you may think it's funny. Perhaps I couldn't do anything really important—at first, but I—I could take a position, couldn't I?"

"What?" he said. "You haven't had any experience."

"But how do you get experience?"

He shrugged. Her persistence was disconcerting. "Well, if you've just got to have a job, you might try for salesgirl—something like that. You got the looks." He turned away, added, over his shoulder—"But if you take my advice you'll stick to your club feets."

But this was the last advice she was prepared to follow, even if she had heard it. Which she had not. What she had heard, however, sent her out of his office with a definite objective—a job. Not that she intended to keep it. She felt no urge for economic independence, once she had proved her capacity for it.

It was no longer the Psyche nor the hotel bill, that goaded her, but pride that had yet to know the bitter taste of defeat. It was pride, nipping her heels like a relentless pup, that hounded her from shop to shop during those three days.

In those three days, Teddy Lysle made the acquaintance of emotions and sensations that had been strangers to her before. On the fourth morning she lay in bed thinking about them, remembering that this was the day she would be expected home from the Maddens' house party, desperately nursing the hope that the morning's mail would save her yet. Surely one of the countless pleasant gentlemen who had promised to "let her hear from them" would make good his promise today.

Since she had spent her last ten cents yesterday, there was no necessity for her to get up until she could be certain, first, that the mail had arrived, and, second, that the kindly young clerk had relieved the melancholy man at the desk. Then, too, whenever she lifted her head, the small room showed a ribald tendency to behave itself like a merry-go-round.

"Now for Pete's sake," she admonished it when, at nine, she managed to get to her feet, "be yourself!"

The giddiness had passed by the time she had bathed and dressed, and it was with a crisp and businesslike air that she greeted the nice young clerk and demanded her mail.

"Nothing this morning," he said, "except this."

"Oh, yes. The bill, isn't it?"

"That brings you up to date, I think. Correct, isn't it?"

"Yes—yes, quite. I—I'll attend to it," and she smiled upon him brightly and went out.

It was a dull day with a morose threat of rain in the air. Teddy walked swiftly, for when she lagged her knees tended to melt. She meant, presently, to think about her situation but, for the moment, nothing seemed so important as to walk firmly and purposefully forward. She was surprised that she could ever have thought this a simple performance. But of course it had been simply because her legs had never been so refractory before nor her head so balloonish. After all, it might be better to go back to the hotel. She could walk smartly past the desk as though she were just going up to write a check. Then she could lie down. That was what she really wanted most to do—to lie down. She turned sharply, heard a protesting voice ending on a note of alarm.

"Hey, matcha—Look out!"

She rose slowly, sedately out of a deep dark well. Far above her were light and sound, voices that she heard faintly, and a queer kind of smell that was a blend of cleaning fluid and brandy. She was floating upward with the most charming ease until she struck her head on the well curb. She groaned feebly and heard a man's voice:

"That's fine. She'll do. Deliberate self-starvation, without a doubt. Where women get this crazy idea that skeletons are attractive! I'll wager this little flapper hasn't had anything more substantial than a fruit salad for days."

"Soda," said Teddy with a mighty effort. "Ice cream soda."

She lay there, grimly enjoying the silence this produced, until she realized with astonishment that her eyes were closed. She opened them promptly, closed them with a moan. Her second attempt succeeded better, for she lifted her lids by degrees and, by the time they were fully spread, she was not too surprised to find herself lying on a kind of table in the middle of a small, white room. A kindly, middle-aged face in a nurse's cap was not far above her own and a youngish man was holding her hand.

"Well," she said, "I guess this is where I pull the hoary—where am I?"

"Quite safe and in a very nice hospital," the nurse told her gently. "You must have fainted on the street and you've hurt your head a little. Don't try to talk until you feel better."

Teddy shifted her gaze to the young man. It was evident now that he was a doctor.

"Fine," he said, "fine! She can be moved presently. If you'll give me your telephone number—and name."

Then she remembered. Her father had been right. She had starved in a week.

"I'm not going home," she said belligerently.

"That's probably just as well," the doctor said. "We can make you comfortable here. You'll see about a room, nurse?"

"But a private room costs money, doesn't it?" asked Teddy.

Doctor and nurse exchanged glances. "Why—yes."

"Then I don't want it. You can just put me with the rest of the charity patients."

The kindly nurse was distressed. "But you're not one, my dear." She shook her head, smiling. "You see, I can tell."

"Listen," said Teddy, "I helped raise money for the hospital fund this year and I guess that entitles me to something."

It was plain that they were puzzled. They held a whispered conference near the door. Then the doctor left and the nurse approached the new patient, printed form in hand.

"Now then, my dear! Think you feel up to answering a few questions?"

But when she handed this document to the doctor an hour later, her lips were folded grimly. "I thought I'd just let you see what her answers were."

He read: Name—Call me later.

NOTES on ROSES

By John A. Armstrong

February is, without qualification, the best month in which to plant roses. The plants are perfectly dormant; there should be no loss in planting, and the plants have just time to get their roots nicely established in the soil before the weather turns warmer and the new growth pushes out. The bushes can be safely handled with bare roots at this season, and in our opinion this is much better than planting from pots or cans, because you can see how good the root system is, and you know that the plants are fresh from the growing fields. Many plants sold in cans or pots have been in these containers for many months and are no better for it. Rose plants are not worth much unless they grow vigorously and bloom freely, so as with most other things, it pays to get the best.

Have You Pruned Yet?

January is the best month in which to give roses their annual heavy pruning in California, but February is almost as good, so if last month's storms kept you indoors and you have neglected your bushes, put on the old gloves, dig out the pruning shears from the utility drawer and get busy. The cardinal principal to keep in mind when pruning roses is that weak, small branches or twigs (or dead ones) will never produce good flowers. Cut such wood all away and leave only the strongest, newest canes, and then shorten these canes somewhat, remembering that large, strong plants need to be cut less than weak ones.

The Annual Rose Banquet

Now is also the time for the big annual application of barnyard fertilizer, preferably well-rotted cow manure. Pruning and fertilizing are comparatively simple and easily accomplished, yet without them we cannot have good roses.

The Honor Roll

What varieties to plant? What kinds to add to your present collections? These are subjects which could easily fill many columns such as this, but if I were selecting five roses of each shade for my own planting, the following would be the favored ones. All are Hybrid Teas, blooming during Spring, Summer and Fall, with no climbers, baby roses or strictly spring bloomers included.

Some of the newest introductions, which probably should be included above, are omitted purposely until we have had time to watch them a little more. We will deal with those in this column later.

FARM and GARDEN
Magazine of the Sunday Los Angeles Times

COMMENT AND OPINION

Farm and Garden

Devoted to the multiform agricultural interests of the great Southwest and issued every week with the world's biggest Sunday newspaper.

EDITED BY HAROLD M. FINLEY

Communications from practical farmers, ranchers, stock raisers, poultrymen, gardeners and others engaged either in a large or small way in the vital work of agricultural production are gladly received. Address all letters to editorial department, Farm and Garden Magazine

Real Altruism

CALIFORNIA is warned against seeking a continuation of tariff protection for its agricultural commodities in a pamphlet issued in San Francisco by a gentleman of European extraction who has been in this State and country just about long enough to go to press with his solemn admonitions. Had he been hired by the State's growers to help press their case against low tariff and "free tariff" advocates he couldn't have done a more convincing job of it. A foreigner giving Californians reasons why they should work to have the bars let down to the fruit and nuts of Italy and other Mediterranean countries of Europe—well, that is "good," as they so expressively say in those circles in which a spade is called, without anxiety for euphemistic embroidering, a spade.

"There is a strong movement in Europe for free trade," he tells us so-simple Americans. Yes, for free trade with us! He hastens to explain that this movement he talks about isn't as yet in evidence in official circles. "It has not yet risen from the people." While it is "rising," apparently, would be a good time for us of California and America to instruct our government that we want our ports thrown wide open to everything that cheap foreign labor can produce. We can show what rare good sports we are by anticipating Europe's benevolent free trade before even European officialdom knows about it.

"America needs to have duties lowered everywhere," we are told by this kindly adviser. "Higher duties in Europe for American agricultural products represent a big factor in the American crisis of agriculture, and California represents the most outstanding homogeneous group of interests particularly committed to such a broad view policy," he adds. Well, that's "hot," to resort again to a manner of saying things prevalent on the streets, where men say what they think. California has rather held out for protection of its major industries—that's a fact. And Californians would like to know where they'd be if they hadn't. America doesn't need lowered duties in America—it's Europe that needs 'em. We've done pretty well, too, and without howling about the ways in which other nations regulate their own importations, when it has come to marketing our stuff abroad. Perfect honesty would compel us to admit, in fact, that it has been our own languid and indifferent attitude toward the subject of agricultural trade expansion in other countries, rather than any handicaps offered by these countries to our entry, that has kept us from making a far bigger showing in this respect.

It is touching that anyone so recently established in our State as is the author of this pamphlet should be rushing into print to show us the way to "help ourselves." But with all the gentleman's assurances and warnings, we cannot but believe we are on the right track in sticking to policies that have paid us so well in the past. We can't help thinking that there will be some use for our tariffs for some years to come and that Europe itself is going to make a great mistake when (and if!) it kicks out all tariffs on imported stuff just for the sake of being sweet and kind to us.

Farm Board's Move

AN INDICATION of the troubles which will face the Federal Farm Board in its attempt to unify co-operative sales efforts of growers, is seen in the refusal of the Mutual Orange Distributors to consider the proposal of C. C. Teague of the Farm Board that it hold a committee conference with the California Fruit Growers' Exchange and the Farm Board, to discuss possible consolidation of the two co-operatives.

The larger co-operative, on the other hand, expressed willingness to partake in the conference.

Part of a statement by E. G. Dexell, general manager of the California Fruit Growers Exchange, says:

"Certainly the positions taken by the Mutual Orange Distributors and the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, as indicated in their replies to the invitation of the Federal Farm Board, cannot both be in the interest of the growers, and the grower's interest is identical whether he markets through one or the other co-operative organization."

At any rate, the first impasse has been reached in California. The gallery is waiting for the next move, which apparently is Mr. Teague's.

Must Be Co-ops

A FEW days ago an ex-soldier appeared at the office of the Los Angeles County Farm Bureau, asking for a loan from the Federal Farm Board. With him was a woman who was waiting until he got the money so she could sell him some land. It took some arguing to convince them that the Farm Bureau had nothing to do with the Farm Board However, they would have got no farther therg.

James C. Stone, vice-chairman of the Federal Farm Board, has issued a statement to the effect that the board cannot deal with individual farmers, but must do business with co-operative organizations which qualify under the Capper-Volstead Act of 1922. He defines the proper sort of co-operative as "an organization of persons in agricultural production acting in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce such products of persons so engaged."

"Such associations," says Mr. Stone," may have marketing agencies in common, and such associations and their members may make the necessary contracts and agreements effecting such purposes. However, such associations shall be operated for the mutual benefit of the members and must conform to the following requirements:

"No member is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein, and the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent annually."

Another requirement is that the association shall not deal in the products of nonmembers to an amount greater in value than is handled for the members.

Several national co-operatives have been formed already with the assistance of the board and when these are established the board will require all State or regional co-operatives to affiliate with the national organization of the class to which they should belong.

Our Cover Page

Los Angeles county dairy farms are not built exclusively for financial returns, for they also reflect the love of beauty that the dairymen possess. The scene depicted on our cover page this week is one on La Lomita Rancho, at Palms, where F. R. Bain has collected and is breeding a particularly typy and productive herd of Jerseys on one of Southern California's fine country estates.

Farm advisers and home demonstration agents from forty-three counties attended the fifteenth annual conference of the Agricultural Extension Service of the University of California at Berkeley early last month. Before the meeting broke up they had this group photograph taken. The Extension Service pledged its aid anew to the program of the Federal Farm Board to encourage co-operation as a basis for permanent farm relief and stressed a program of intensive economic study of crop production costs in 1930. The underlying theme of the conference was "A Satisfactory Farm Life." Reports submitted by secretaries showed an increased activity by the farm advisers' staffs for last year by comparison with the year before.

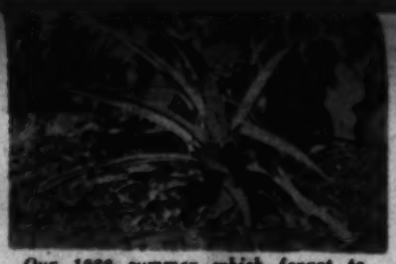
An airplane view of the University of California Experiment Station just out of Riverside. The buildings are clustered on a knoll in the foreground. Against the slope of the hill may be seen the avocado plantings and nurseries and above the latter, the irrigation reservoir with its storage capacity of 710,000 gallons. The water in it is lifted 160 feet from the Gage canal, running through the property. Beyond the buildings are the large experimental orchards and in the background the suburbs of Riverside. Even this view from on high does not show the entire holding of nearly 800 acres. The photograph was taken from one of the planes of the U. S. Air Corps.

The Poultry Yard

Successive Snows With Slow Melting Fill Underground Reservoirs

REDLANDS.—Underground reservoirs, drawn on so heavily by a series of dry seasons, will be fully replenished if the mountain districts continue to get snows such as January brought. There was a heavier fall of snow in the first big storm of the season than has been recorded for several years, one reaching a total of seven to eight feet in depth on the crests of the mountains and over six feet in Big Bear Valley. Such snows as these, seeping water into the ground during the slow melting, fill the underground caches of the valley. Man is attempting to aid in this process by building check dams at strategic points in the canyons, holding back the water until it has time to seep down through the shale and decomposed granite and feed the springs and streams that flow into the underground lakes in San Bernardino Valley.

This spreading of surface water now being done in several places in the San Bernardino Mountains is a great aid but water experts all say that much better is a heavy fall of snow, layer on layer through successive storms, which melts so slowly that the water seeps into the ground instead of running off.



Our 1929 summer which forgot to quit produced this pineapple in December, just eight blocks from the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce Building, at the home of Mrs. E. H. Olsson, 1425 West Twelfth Place. It was "juicy and sweet," she said.

Page James Dole!

When one thinks of Hawaii, one naturally calls to mind grass skirts, ukuleles and pineapples. We've had the grass skirts and co-ed fiddles for some years on the mainland, but pineapples haven't been much in evidence, except in cans. Now we've found a gardener who grows 'em.

Mrs. E. H. Olsson of 1425 West 12th Place, Los Angeles, sends us a photo of an honest-to-goodness pineapple that matured [illegible] Chamber of Commerce Building."

The pineapple in question was planted in 1926, but Jack Frost did not allow it to mature that year. It seems to have remained dormant, in fact, until April last year, then started to grow vigorously and matured in December. The family had fresh pineapple as a dessert on Christmas Day, and, according to the letter, "it was very juicy and sweet."

To Handle Tractors

The Frank T. Hickey Company of Los Angeles has been selected by the Ford Motor Company to be a distributor of Fordson agricultural tractors. The company will have supervision of the territory including Southern California, Arizona, Clark and Lincoln counties in Nevada and Hidalgo county in New Mexico and will be responsible for the appointment of approximately ten dealers. This announcement is in line with a new plan of distribution whereby the sale of Fordson tractors, formerly handled by Ford automobile dealers, is being placed with dealers in farm machinery. Ford dealers, however, will continue to service the Fordson tractor. Important improvements are announced for the new model Fordson farm power machine.

[illegible] service in co-operation with Radio Stations KFI, is as follows:

February 3—"Farm Bureau Organization Work," by Earl Maharg, executive secretary, Los Angeles County Farm Bureau.

February 4—"Feeding Baby Chickens," by C. V. Castle, assistant farm adviser, Los Angeles county.

February 5—"The Value of Quarantine to the Cotton Growers of California," by A. E. Bottel, agricultural commissioner, Riverside county.

February 6—"Windbreaks for Orchard Protection," by Woodbridge Metcalf, extension specialist in forestry, University of California, Berkeley.

February 7—"1930 Agricultural Outlook for Fruits," by M. B. Rounds, farm adviser, Los Angeles county.

Los Angeles County Is Cleaning Up on Bovine "T. B." Without Any Fuss or Aid From Outside Sources

By H. H. Bushnell

GETTING clear of bovine tuberculosis! That's what every dairyman wants to do. But it costs him money, and sometimes he thinks he can't afford it. If anybody can figure out a scheme whereby the dairyman can get rid of his infected cows, and replace them with healthy ones without ruining him, he's for it.

Let it be understood right off the reel that the problem isn't one of public safety. Laws have required all dairymen who sell raw milk to have clean herds, and the others must pasteurize carefully, so danger of human infection hasn't entered into the situation. It has been a matter of improving dairy cattle conditions and freeing the animals themselves from an insidious disease.

In many States, funds are provided to repay dairymen so unfortunate as to have infected herds, at least partially, for the loss of their cattle. California has such a law, but it has been a question whether it was constitutional. Right now, a test case has been carried up to the Supreme Court and there awaits a final decision.

But Los Angeles county didn't feel like waiting on the Supreme Court. She "cleaned up," and she did it without any help from State funds—no charity—no sentimentality—just by applying business principles and through the co-operation of a number of agencies. The county livestock department, the county farm bureau, the State Department of Agriculture, the State University extension department and the Federal Bureau of Animal Industry all must be credited with shares in the work.

The County Board of Supervisors secured an ordinance whereby no tubercular cattle could be shipped into the county; this was the first step. Next came a certain amount of education among the dairymen themselves. A tubercular cow doesn't live as long or give as much milk—isn't as profitable as a healthy cow free from disease. That being the case, "won't you find that it pays to keep healthy cows and no others?" the official agencies asked.

Surely! But it wasn't as simple as that. One reactor will fill her sisters with germs. And you can't clean up one at a time. It has to be done all at once.

Effective Arguments

"Make it pay to keep clean cows," appears to have been the slogan of those interested. In June, 1928, the Los Angeles milk distributors, creamerymen and dairymen met and decided it was no more than fair to pay more for a product coming from clean herds. The first differential was 3 cents a pound; Later this was increased to 10 cents a pound premium from the cleaned-up herds. And so it is that nowadays a Los Angeles county dairyman can hardly afford to put off testing and discarding all reactors. Pretty nearly all of them have done that very thing.

We can observe the results of the quiet campaign which has been carried along and which isn't quite over yet—a work which the faint-hearted said couldn't be done without the aid of State funds. From July 1, 1928, to June 30, 1929, practically all the dairy herds of Los Angeles county were cleaned up, as well as many of those outside the county that serve this metropolitan area.

Nobody knows exactly how badly the Los Angeles county cows were infected prior to that first date mentioned above, but it was plenty. Estimating from what data were at hand, some say a third of the cows had "it," maybe more, and almost certainly not less. At the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1929, the trouble had been cut down to about 3 per cent!

There aren't many counties in the United States whose cows are cleaner than those right here. A new ordinance is up for passage now before the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors, which will bar from the city any milk from infected herds outside our limits, and this will have a widening effect on the fight against bovine tuberculosis.

Planning the Fight

Because of its size and peculiar contour, Los Angeles county was divided into districts and in each of these the work was done, not by compulsion but by co-operation. When a dairyman concluded that it would pay him to clean up, the necessary tests were made for him by recognized veterinarians, the reactors were separated, the premises were disinfected thoroughly and the herd started off 100 per cent "pure."

Even before the work began in earnest, and before the price differential was made, the Los Angeles county farm at Hond began a clean-up. If the county was going to clean house, its farm felt that is should set a good example. The entire farm herd—a big one—was tested, and the reactors were left in the old quarters, while the clean ones, 157 of them, that had bills of health from the "vets," were taken to new premises about a mile away, where the equipment had never been used before.

There are (or were, lastaJune) 1246 herds of dairy cattle in Los Angeles county, including 53,406 cows, to which may be added 830 single cows (not unmarried, but owned by families who used one cow only.) Of all these, 97 per cent have been tested.

Los Angeles county dairymen depend largely for their replacements on outside sources. In the year which closed last July, 27,022 dairy cows were shipped into Los Angeles county for replacement purposes, 21,181 of them coming from other States. Of this entire number, over 24,000 were tested here, and but 578 reactors found, and discarded. It is worth noting that around $3,000,000 is spent each year for replacement cattle in Los Angeles county herds, and that of this sum $2,500,000 goes out of the State, chiefly because of a lack of dairy cattle near by which can measure up to the requirements here. So it will pay other districts to clean up, too, for the money which they could have for replacement cattle we need would amount to more than all the indemnity they could hope to get from any funds from the State, even if the law now undergoing test should prove constitutional.

Our Main Sources

Keeping clean is just as particular a job as getting clean. Other States have realized this and seldom do they send us dairy cows which are infected. Idaho sent most of our last year's replacements; next came Utah; then Arizona; then Colorado, with Oregon fifth. The greatest replacement source within the State is Tulare county.

Under the most rigid of rules, herds may become accredited. There are a number of these in Los Angeles county, and others which could get the same credit. In fact, we have cleaned our house and while we aren't getting careless, we can certainly take pride in what has been accomplished in a year. Next July maybe the figures will show us in such a state as was required of Caesar's wife.

When one considers the long campaigns which have been conducted elsewhere, the slow progress they have made, even where the State pays the dairymen for their executed cows, the tremendous efforts put forth and the lagging response, the accomplishment in Los Angeles county is more than a feat to be bragged over—it becomes an example worthy of emulation elsewhere, an example of co-operation on the part of many agencies, all interested in speedy and lasting improvement in a great and necessary industry.

Here are some of the men who have been active in the clean-up campaign in Los Angeles county dairies, and one of the means for stimulating pride in production and health in the herds. From left to right are M. B. Rounds, Los Angeles county farm adviser; W. R. Harriman, superintendent, Los Angeles county farm; Clarence Michel, Santa Monica Dairy; Dr. M. Rosenberger, Adohr Stock Farm; Carl Williams, Pottenger Sanitarium; F. B. Carter, Arden Dairy; Dr. L. M. Hurt, Los Angeles county live-stock inspector; Douglas Frampton, Artesia dairyman; C. V. Castle, live-stock specialist, county farm adviser's office, and Earl Maharg, secretary of the Los Angeles county farm bureau. In front of them are the trophies awarded at the Dairy Day festivities held at the close of last year's work by the farm bureau along dairy lines.

ORANGE COUNTY FARMERS STUDY EXPENSES

By Harold E. Wahlberg
Farm Adviser, Orange County

JUST now, when agriculture is in an economic frame of mind, and the Federal Farm Board is encouraging co-operation as the basis of successful farm relief, it is interesting to note how the activities of the agricultural extension service and farm bureaus are pointing in that direction.

The economic studies under way in Orange county, as in many other counties of this State, are furnishing a means by which the grower can measure the efficiency of his production enterprise. There are four factors that are essential to a successful farm business, quality production, quantity production, economic production, and controlled distribution. The work of the extension service, in co-operation with the Orange County Farm Bureau, has been exerted with these four factors in mind. The commodity departments of the organization briefly reviewed their 1929 activities at the recent annual meeting of the Orange County Bureau directors, held at Santa Ana, and the reports showed the impress that these factors have made.

C. V. Newman, chairman of the citrus growers' department, reported that the year's studies revealed that it cost an average of $408.29 per acre to grow Valencia oranges. The costs were divided as follows: Labor $93.40; materials,$96.61; taxes, $31.26; overhead, interest and depreciation, $187.02.

An analysis of the data gathered during the year showed that growers practicing moderate cultivation obtained higher yields than others. The ten groves reporting highest cultivation costs averaged 125 packed boxes per acre. The ten lightest cultivated groves averaged 148 packed boxes per acre. Their per-acre cultivation costs were $36.57 and $10.28, respectively. In the use of irrigation water, the summary of the records showed that the moderate users of water got highest yields and returns.

The lemon records showed a total average cost of $433.07 per acre, divided as follows: labor, $145.39; materials, $80.44; taxes, $34.69; overhead interest and depreciation, $172.56. Lemon returns are improving, according to the reports of co-operators engaged in the study. The lemon distribution policy of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange apparently has influenced the price trend greatly.

Two citrus growers' extension schools, each covering four days of lectures and demonstrations, were held during the year, 500 growers registering for the spring sessions, and 450 at the fall sessions, the largest classes ever held in the State.

The seventh annual excursion from Orange county to the citrus experiment station at Riverside attracted 350 growers. The annual winter and summer institutes for citrus growers, held in co-operation with

The Poultry Yard

An Egg Market Idea

THE POSSIBILITIES OF DIRECT SELLING

By W. J. Dryden

FOR years the American poultryman has concentrated on high egg production costs, but has lost sight of something more fundamental—the reduction of marketing costs.

The laws of business are as inevitable as the laws of nature. Business swings toward lowest costs. In the marketing of eggs this necessitates the elimination of one or more of the mediums through which the product now passes from producer to consumer—or the reduction of distribution costs by co-operative sales effort.

Data compiled by the Pennsylvania State College would indicate that the average cost of marketing eggs direct to the consumer is $.047 per dozen, as compared to $.006 when eggs are sold direct to hucksters. The advisability of marketing direct, therefore depends upon the poultryman's ability to secure $.041 more per dozen from the consumer than he can secure from the huckster.

Unless considerably more than this amount can be secured, while economically sound, it is of doubtful practicability to sell direct to the consumer. It is not uncommon for consumers to expect eggs bought direct from the producer to be sold below retail prices. The producer should not demand more than retail prices, unless he secures a bonus for quality fresh eggs —nor should he sell below local retail prices.

Merchants to Blame

It has been a common practice among many merchants to pay from 3 to 12 cents a dozen less to the producer than they would have to pay to the commission merchant. The merchant, therefore, has only himself to blame when poultrymen begin to investigate the possibilities of selling directly to the merchant's customers. There is a need of fewer kinks in the marketing chain, fewer fees exacted by middlemen, and a general and reasonable shortening of the marketing "chain."

And this "chain" can be shortened considerably. It is long at best, and when the producer tries to shorten it very much he finds himself to be a green hand at a complicated business, running against difficulties and costs to which he has never given a thought, often using time and labor needed on the farm.

Egg routes, similar to milk routes now in operation, constitute one new plan now being placed in operation in certain localities. The plan is to have regular poultry and egg routes, call at the consumer's door, pick up "egg tickets," and leave the number of eggs called for.

Books of egg tickets can be sold, covering a two or more weeks' period at a set price per dozen. The premium called for can be sufficient to protect the producer against an advance in egg prices.

This plan of marketing is proving practical and it will pay poultrymen to investigate their local market conditions in order to determine the advisability of applying this method of selling to their own products.

Many factors must be taken into consideration in the selection of an egg route. It is well to start this plan on a small scale, gradually building up the trade. To do away with the need of excessive solicitation at the start, the location should be where the producer has friends, relatives or present customers, who will use his eggs and secure new customers for him.

Three or four good boosters in one locality will soon build up a paying egg route. Whether the location selected will be in a wealthy residential section, apartment-house district, or section of small homes, depends upon the local conditions and upon the producer's ability to deal with various classes of customers.

In some localities it may be possible and advisable to contract with established milk routes to handle the eggs. Local laws must be consulted before operations are started. Certain cities may have laws against the egg routes, or require bond and inspection.

It must be remembered that different customers will require a different class of eggs. Whether they demand brown-shelled of white-shelled, pale or dark yolks, large or small eggs—the demand should be met if possible. No other form of advertising will increase the demand as will the marketing of a first-class product.

Increasing Sales

By putting the eggs in sealed cartons, with each egg stamped "guaranteed strictly fresh," followed by the date, a special premium can be secured. Rubber stamps can be purchased which are flexible and fit over the large end of an agg. An Oregon producer was able to secure 5 cents a dozen premium for stamped eggs.

No form of marketing offers the possibilities of growth that the egg-route system does. If only fine fresh eggs are sold, sealed in labeled cartons, with the date stamped on each egg, if the eggs are well graded for size, shape and color, and sold according to United States standards, if oddly shaped shell-stained, cracked and double-yolk eggs are not offered, increasing business should result.

Albert Zoraster, young Van Nuys poultryman who has been working at the business of incubating chicks since he was fifteen years old.

This Boy Made Good

Young Operator of Hatchery Has Had Years of Experience

VAN NUYS.—The story of Albert Zoraster, who is now a member of the Russell Poultry Yards organization here, is the story of youthful enthusiasm, a will to work hard, and a genius for successful production.

In 1921, when Mr. Zoraster was a boy of 15, he came to this community with his mother and younger brother. Having to help make the family's way in the world, the boy worked at night at a small poultry ranch and hatchery, and attended Van Nuys High School during the day. The following year he graduated with honors.

In 1923, he wished to take over the ranch where he had been employed. A mortgage was necessary, and Albert was only seventeen years old, not a man in the eyes of the law. But his mother had faith in him, and signed the necessary papers. By the end of the year the obligation was paid in full.

In 1924, the Zoraster hatchery had a 10,000-egg capacity, which was increased to 13,000 in 1925. In January, 1926, the first mammoth incubator was installed, increasing the capacity to 22,000. In June of that year, young Mr. Zoraster bought an acre at the corner of Vanowen Boulevard and Woodley avenue, where he built a small home and a hatchery with a capacity of 25,000 eggs. The next December the boy started purchasing eggs from the Russell Poultry Yards in Oregon, the firm with which he was eventually to cast his fortunes. In 1928, the capacity of his hatchery had increased to 62,000 eggs, and he was doing custom hatching for the Russell yards as well as carrying on his own business.

Eighteen months ago the Russell Poultry Yards of California became an entity, with Albert Zoraster as secretary-treasurer. Mr. Zoraster remained in charge of the hatchery which now has three behemoth incubators holding 52,000 eggs, and three smaller ones holding a total of 40,000 eggs—a hatchery through which can pass every three weeks between twelve and thirteen tons of eggs.

This Van Nuys boy, at twenty-four years of age, is an important member of a going concern, and holder of a responsible position which demands a great deal of technical knowledge and experience.

A "Cow County"

SANTA BARBARA.—Animal husbandry in Santa Barbara county returned to ranchers more than $3,500,000 in 1929, according to estimates announced by Eugene S. Kellogg, Santa Barbara county's agricultural commissioner.

This county, since the first white settlement here, has been a great ranching district, says Mr. Kellogg. He estimated that sales of cattle alone in 1929, brought the ranchers $1,962,565, as against $2,034,375 in 1928, the number of head produced being about the same in both years.

Calves brought $97,800 to ranchers in 1929 and $96,550 in 1928, the number of calves produced having increased about 1000 in 1929. There was a sharp drop in the returns from hogs, which brought about $100,000.

More than 10,000 lambs, returning $80,000 to ranchers in the county, were sold last year. The status of poultry in the county remained about the same, this industry returning some $20,000 to the farmers. Eggs also produced about the same returns, $175,000 being the total.

Butter fat, milk and dairy products returned $1,033,500 to dairymen last year. This represents an increase of about $10,000 in sales. Only 300 mules and horses were sold in the county in 1929, bringing about $27,000 to the owners.

Turkey mullein, present in small quantities in hay, is said to account for a serious diminishment in the milk production of dairy herds in Southern California, and hereafter all hay inspected by the State will be tested for the presence of this noxious weed, which is found growing from Tehama county south to the Mexican border. Cattle do not eat it willingly, but may get some of it when mixed with hay. Turkey mullein in past days was utilized by Indians for poisoning arrowheads.

NEW SERVICE TO POULTRYMEN

"OCCO" VITAMIZED POULTRY COMPOUND

is now being offered in this territory for the first time. Progressive poultrymen will be interested in learning the feeding economy and greater profits it will make possible for them.

Oelwein Chemical Company of Iowa have been manufacturing "OCCO" Poultry and Livestock Compounds for nearly two decades and have splendid reputation and an immense demand for their products all over the Middle West.

The company is now established in the Pacific Southwest. The Coast Branch is located in Los Angeles. It is under the management of C. F. Ladeburg with whom is associated Jacob Krauss, Acting Chemist.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF AGRICULTURAL ACTIVITIES IN THE SOUTHWEST

Pomona Rainy weather checked the picking of oranges and shipments from Pomona Valley dropped in consequence. A dozen cars of oranges and six cars of lemons went out from the San Antonio Fruit Exchange, and with clearing weather most of the packing-houses will resume activities. The market is in good conditon for both oranges and lemons, prices for the latter being specially satisfactory for this time of year. There was a good demand for the larger sized navel oranges during the holiday season Although the crop in this district will run, according to estimates, not over 50 per cent average, the fruit is in excellent shape and good prices during the season are anticipated.

Imperial The list of awards for the Imperial County Fair, to be held February 25 to March 2, has been mailed, and it is believed will attract a large number of exhibitors. The race track is nearing completion and the grand stand is now being built for the fair. All will be in readiness for an excellent showing when the new grounds are dedicated to the first exposition under county auspices that Imperial Valley has ever held.

The Imperial Irrigation District is making a contract with the Gerrard Company, which owns four sections of land north of Brawley, whereby the fruit company will maintain its own canals for irrigation. By this contract the district pays $2000 a year for five years, and $1000 a year for ten, after which the fruit company must bear the entire responsibility of canal service without further responsibility on the part of the district.

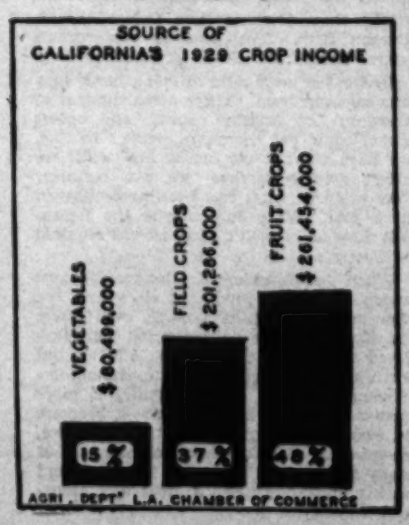
Santa Maria There are 5177 acres of cauliflower now in the ground in Santa Barbara county, centering around Guadalupe and Santa Maria, according to Eugene Kellogg, Santa Barbara county's agricultural commissioner. This is an increase of 30 per cent over last year. Some 600 or 700 acres of the planting are in the vicinity of Lompoc. Movement has commenced, prices are satisfactory to the grower, and the quality has been greatly improved by the recent rains. Forty per cent of the entire crop is shipped by truck to the Los Angeles markets, a haul of 180 miles. The remainder goes out of the State by rail. Careful inspection insures high quality. All truck loads going to Los Angeles are stopped and inspected at Buellton, where a year-'round highway inspection station is maintained by the Santa Barbara county agricultural commissioner and the State Department of Agriculture.

Fruit crop production is still the major agricultural activity in California, although field crops and vegetables are increasing in importance each year. This chart shows the proportion of the $353,000,000 farm income of last year contributed by each class of crops.



The strange spectacle of snow in San Fernando Valley was exciting the inhabitants a few weeks ago. Mostly it did good, gradually releasing the moisture into the thirsty soil, but it did some harm in spots, too. This picture shows the edge of a lemon grove owned by J. P. Butler, Chatsworth, who reports that the snow was so heavy on his loaded trees that many of them were broken down. Needless to say, eastern papers will copy—it's a chance they don't get once in a generation.

Anaheim Leon O. Whitsell, State railroad commissioner, recently told members of the Anaheim Farm Center that the public utilities department of the California Farm Bureau Federation was responsible for the saving of more than $1,700,000 to the agricultural users of public utilities last year. Of this amount, $540,000 in rate reductions and $400,000 in refunds were secured from the Pacific Gas and Electric Company; $250,000 reductions and $175,000 refunds from the San Joaquin Light and Power corporation and $400,000 in reductions from the San Diego Gas and Electric Company.

The 1930 Valencia crop will mature about thirty days late in Orange county this year, observations made by the association laboratory, here, indicate. The sizes will be larger. Fruit measured early in December and again in early January showed a growth for the thirty-day period nearly twice as great as for any similar period in the past five years. The recent rains were especially beneficial in cleaning the trees and supplying an even moisture content throughout the orchards. In many groves the only moisture that gets to the root system immediately under the trees is that which comes from heavy rains.

Beaumont Due to inconveniences experienced by farmers in the Beaumont Irrigation District in obtaining water for poultry raising and truck gardening, the board of directors of that district has made schedules for water delivery more pliable. Heretofore, members could only secure water on their regular schedule. Beginning with the 1930 season, any owner of one acre or more may, at his own option, take the equivalent of one acre-foot of water at any time during the season as he chooses. There is to be no extra charge for this service, the regular minimum of $7 for the 6184 cubic feet available being paid, no matter when he uses it. However, on the balance of his acreage the water is to be delivered on the regular schedule.

McFarland Local bankers report a number of people, formerly tenants of northern Kern county farms, buying the properties they had been renting. Among these are mentioned C. A. Reid, who bought the Oelke ranch; Lester Ingram, the Kraft place; E. C. Cozart, the Frank Evert ranch; and Herman Bonkosky, who purchased eighty acres northwest of here. Newcomers are Mr. and Mrs. James P. Hollaway, from Riviera, who have bought a twenty-acre place on the Elmo highway, half of which is in grapes; the rest will be in cotton this year. J. E. Williams of this community has leased the S. C. Emmons sixty-acre ranch a mile and a half east of here.

Ventura The Inter-county Walnut Growers' Institute is to be held on February 18, at the Ventura Union High School under the auspices of the inter-county walnut growers' department of the Farm Bureau and the agricultural extension service, according to P. A. Tetley, chairman of that organization. The last institute in Ventura county was held in the spring of 1926 at Santa Paula. A committee is preparing a program that should be of interest to all walnut growers of California. It is to include subjects of production and the economic phases of the industry. The meeting is to start promptly at 9:45 a.m. and is to extend into the afternoon.

Tulare September 16 to 20 were fixed as the dates for the Tulare County Fair of 1930, at a recent session in Fresno of the tri-county fair association, composed of Fresno, Kern and Tulare county fair boards. By virtue of the formation of a circuit, exhibitions will have an opportunity to show at all of the San Joaquin Valley fairs without a break.

Acting on a recent recommendation of the Tulare Chamber of Commerce, an additional dairy inspector has been employed at the Tulare testing station of the Los Angeles Board of Health. Stephen E. Sackstaver, the new inspector, has assumed his duties here, increasing the staff to four and incidentally reflecting the growth of the local dairy industry. Charles R. White is technician in charge, and Thomas Beddo, R. C. Harrison and Mr. Sackstaver are inspectors.

Riverside Four hundred and forty-six of the 1691 cows tested during December by the Riverside county Cow-testing Association produced forty pounds or more butterfat, a recent report by Glen B. Wilkins and Ronald Christy, official testers, shows. The average milk production was 869 pounds, and the average butter fat 36.1 pounds. Records are now being compiled for the past year, and the annual contest will be completed when winners are announced and prizes awarded at the meeting of the county organization, February 1, at Alvord. Speakers from the California Agricultural Extension Service will be present on that occasion, and a turkey dinner will be served.

San Luis Obispo The Farm Bureau of San Luis Obispo county joined with those of San Benito, Monterey, and Santa Cruz in a district conference, held January 17, 18 and 19 at Monterey, devoted to training leaders to conduct farm center meetings. The object of securing trained leadership is to stimulate interest in these primary units of the farm bureau.

Santa Ana The local United States weather bureau station, operated by E. E. Campbell, reports that the rainfall this season to January 15 totaled 5.99 inches, as compared with 4.43 inches last year at the same time. Growers are conjecturing on the rainfall for the rest of the season. Bean growers, grain growers, and all dry farm growers are of course concerned with the distribution of spring rains. Mr. Campbell, for their benefit, has compiled rainfall data for the years 1920 to 1929, inclusive, showing that the average precipitation for the six months, January to June, inclusive, has been 8.17 inches during those years. The rainfall for each year after January 10 is recorded as follows: 1920, 9.23 inches; 1921, 10.32 inches; 1922, 9.18 inches; 1923, 4.11 inches; 1924, 7.93 inches; 1925, 5.10 inches; 1926, 10.81 inches; 1927, 14.30 inches; 1928, 4.96 inches; 1929, 5.67 inches; average for the decade, 8.17 inches.

Terra Bella A. J. Hunsaker, wheat rancher residing between here and Ducor, is nursing a crop of dates on one of a row of palms in front of his country residence. There are four big clusters of fat dates on the tree and the fruit will soon be ready to be harvested. The tree stands at the end of a row of six, three of which are date palms. This one was planted about 1913, but has not had much water and for that reason has made a slow growth. Mr. Hunsaker will give the tree its full share of water from now on and will keep all of the trees on the row well watered, hoping that one of the two others will bear fruit.

Whittier Twenty-four cars of citrus fruit were shipped through the Whittier District Fruit Exchange about the middle of January, including twenty cars of navels and four cars of lemons. The Eastern auction markets on California navels were good on large sizes. Average prices are being influenced by the increasing percentage of medium to large sizes in the offerings and shippers here are urging their sales forces to greater activity in pressing sales on 150s and larger.

Whittier discovered a "fountain of youth" recently on the west bank of the San Gabriel River when it struck a 300-inch flow of water at a depth of forty-seven feet. Gardeners and small farmers using water within the city limits will be heartened to enlarged activities.

Santa Barbara Checks totaling $50,000 were mailed to members of the Santa Barbara County Walnut Growers' Association recently. The amount represents a new grading, a "second" in cull walnuts, tried out for the first time last year. The payment brings the total for the season's crop to around $550,000. Another payment, approximately equaling that mentioned above, is expected to be made late in February to close the books of the association.

Coachella H. C. Hollis, lettuce shipper here, says his firm has sent out ten cars of extra fine quality, which brought $3 a crate f.o.b. Thermal, where the packing and loading were done. He says that the valley should have several hundred acres of lettuce for shipment next January.

San Fernando The importance to San Fernando Valley of its citrus industry is shown in the annual report of just one packing-house, the San Fernando Heights Orange Association, which last year handled a record crop of 193,355 packed boxes of Navel, Jaffa, Valencia and St. Michael oranges, for which it has paid its growers $438,000. It shipped ninety-three cars of valley oranges to foreign lands. E. A. Curtis, who served as president of the association for many years, recently asked that he be relieved of his duties and Glen C. Raddatz was chosen in his stead.

Small Farm Home Contest Winners Are Now Being Picked by Judges

By Ross H. Gast

DURING the next week judges will be busy placing awards in the first annual small farm home contest, which closed yesterday. This contest, sponsored by the Farm and Garden Magazine and the agricultural department of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, developed some very interesting experience-information which will be published in these columns in a few weeks.

The judges are B. R. Holloway, Van Nuys, chairman of the agricultural committee Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce; M. B. Rounds, Los Angeles county farm adviser; Walter Knott, Buena Park, berry grower; Harold M. Finley, editor, Farm and Garden Magazine, and J. B. Corcoran, director of vocational education, Los Angeles city schools.

Each small farm home entered in the contest will be visited, judged and photographs to be used with the letters received in the contest will be taken.

Those who have small farm places or those who intend to develop properties of this kind should watch these columns closely for the experience-information developed in the contest is interesting and valuable.

Planting Potatoes

Last week we covered the initial propagation of soil for the planting of potatoes and sweet corn and set aside planting information for this week's issue.

Space limitations are often taken as a reason for not planting potatoes in the average backyard garden. Another excuse is that there is little to be gained in either quality or price over the corner vegetable stand product. However, these reasons are not sufficient to bar this crop from the backyard, for it is not only an economic practice but the quality of "home growns" is far superior to any that one may buy.

In preparing soil for potatoes one should not incorporate any coarse stable manures. The plot that has been cover-cropped or devoted to alfalfa for a couple of years will prove to be ideal if the seed pieces are not planted too soon after this material has been turned under. Work up the soil thoroughly to a good depth, and do not neglect to store ample moisture in it before planting.

Select the seed carefully. Many local gardens have been infected, especially with nematode, through the indiscriminate planting of potatoes. Insist on clean seed. Cut the seed pieces so that each will have one or more eyes and weigh at least an ounce and a half. Let them stand a couple of days before planting.

Draw furrows thirty-three inches apart and about eight inches deep. Drop the seed pieces in the bottom of the furrows about twelve inches apart. In covering, break the middles between furrows so that the seed pieces are covered about six inches deep and a new furrow is formed between rows.

Never irrigate until the plants are well above the surface of the soil, but cultivate the surface after each rain. When irrigating later, use care that the water is not allowed to flood up around the bases of the plants.

Sweet Corn Can Be Planted

The first planting of sweet corn should go in about this time. While it requires quite a bit of space, one will be surprised how many ears can be produced on four or five rows, fifteen feet long. Of all spring vegetables, sweet corn produced in the home garden will bring the most satisfying results in flavor. There is no comparison between homegrown and that found on the stands.

In preparing the soil for corn, be sure to have an ample supply of moisture in the ground before planting. This is very important; sweet corn always gets a setback when it is irrigated too early. Spade thoroughly, then level the plot. Mark off rows three feet apart in preparation for planting.

When planting sweet corn or any other large vegetable seed on the level, the use of a spade or, better still, a long-handled shovel, works out well. With the seed in a can strapped to the belt or in one pocket, one takes the shovel and places it into the soil at a slight angle so that it penetrates only about an inch and a half or two inches deep. Once in the soil, the handle is pushed forward to a vertical position, leaving a space or slit in the soil back of the blade about an inch deep usually. The seed is dropped in and the shovel withdrawn so that the soil falls back to its original position and covers the seed. One can plant very rapidly in this way. Five or six seeds to the hill and hills two feet apart is the accepted practice.

Later, when the plants are about six inches high the number can be cut down to two or three, depending on the fertility of the soil. Irrigation is taken care of in wide, shallow furrows that should be made between rows when the necessity of added moisture is apparent.

"The king of sweet potatoes," says H. P. Weber of La Habra in offering this photograph of a specimen grown on his place. Twenty-two and one-half pounds it weighed when dug and there were some others that weighed around seven or eight pounds. "We planted slips or cuttings extra late," says Mr. Weber, "and took very little care of them. The gophers took hill after hill. When we finally licked the gophers there were only seven hills left. They were irrigated three times in the season."

Record Vegetable Production

California's prestige as the leading vegetable-producing State of the Union received added support during 1929 when these crops returned $85,499,000 to growers. This is an increase of $5,000,000 over 1928 and the highest income for truck crops on record.

While the vegetables recorded in the State Department of Agriculture report are largely those produced in a large commercial way and the industry is centered in the larger vegetable-growing areas, there is still a place for the small producer on the one-acre or two-acre place close to the city.

In spite of the expansion of vegetable production in the areas such as Imperial and Salinas valleys, the market garden acreage around Los Angeles has shown an increase each year. Products of these districts coming into Los Angeles and surrounding towns have not vitally affected the demand for local-grown produce, especially for the root crops, sweet corn, etc.

We have often been asked whether or not vegetable production on a small scale offers opportunity to the one-acre or two-acre man. We believe that those who are well situated may plant vegetables with good chances of profit if they are in a position to merchandize their products after they are grown. Those who have been successful have built up an outlet in their own districts and plant a wide range of crops so they can supply the full vegetable needs of their customers. Going into this type of production, one should judge the consumptive demand in his territory very closely before he plants.

Alfalfa Pays Two Ways

YUMA GROWERS MAKE HAY, LET IT GO TO SEED AND THEN THRESH IT

Over in Yuma Valley the alfalfa seed industry is a considerable one and requires great care in handling. The mowers have a windrowing attachment which piles the cut crop where the seed dries. It takes about two weeks to "season."

By Iva M. McFadden

ALFALFA has been so long with us that sometimes it's accepted as a matter of course. Alfalfa was a forage crop in the heydey of the great Roman Empire and the Spaniards brought it to the shores of the Pacific when they came as conquerors. In California and throughout the Southwest, we have looked to it for hay, pasture and soil renovation, but though its part on the agricultural stage has been most important, it has generally been rather unobtrusive in its claims until this last season. Now it is a real luminary and stepping into the limelight, has demanded prices that have made the producer smile. These prices are now at their midwinter height and have gone a long way toward stabilizing the bank account not only of the alfalfa grower but of the seedman as well.

Plantings are increasing. This is due to the strong position of alfalfa and also somewhat to the unsatisfactory situation of cotton. Many Southwest acres that before were in that agricultural "snow" will be turned into "green gold," next year. Various factors are operating to advance the price of seed so that the producer of that crop this spring is "sitting pretty."

California produces alfalfa seed, the principal districts being Modoc, Hemet and San Joaquin Valley, but much of the seed, especially that for the southern districts, comes from the neighbor that meets us halfway on the Colorado bridge—Yuma. Here, and in the valleys immediately around, are produced 3,000,000 pounds annually, a tenth of the whole United States production. This district is one of the reclamation projects of the government and its part in the propagation of one of the nation's most reliable crops is noteworthy.

Water Table Helps

Conditions in and about Yuma greatly favor the production of seed, and strange as it may seem, the high water table is one of its advantages. The district lies at the very edge of the Colorado, and not only does the river provide water for surface irrigation, but it creates a moving body of water at a safe distance below the farming level. This is quite different from the tables formed by undue irrigation, which create stationary subterranean pockets that bring the salts to the surface. Here movement is constant, keeping the water fresh and benefiting the few plants that utilize it. Even though the level of this substrata is deep, growers assert that alfalfa is greatly helped by it, particularly during those hot months when the seed is maturing.

Sharing in the production of what is generally known as Yuma seed are Yuma Valley itself, Gila Valley, San Pascuale (the Indian reservation valley on the California side) and Welton. In all, about 10,000 acres produced the output last summer. Averages vary on different lands. A few places have been known to turn out as high as 1200 pounds to the acre; some produce 500, but the average is around 300 pounds to the acre.

Two Income Sources

Producers who go in for seed do not depend on it alone. Quite to the contrary! Three, sometimes even four, crops of hay are made. Always, there is one spring hay cutting, usually in March. Some growers let the next crop seed, while others cut hay once more in May, before allowing the seed to form. Results from these practices seem to vary. Last year early seeding was much heavier and the man who cut only one crop of hay was "to the good" financially, but there have been times when yields were practically identical and growers who produced hay twice were just one hay crop ahead of the game.

Harvesting of seed comes in July and lasts for about six weeks. There may be a second crop of seed forming immediately after the first, but this is usually only about as tenth as large and often does not really pay to cut. The fall hay crop comes off in November, and in very mild winters there may be another cutting in January. Aside from this, there is an income to be derived from the straw that is baled after the seed is harvested. This provides fertiliser for citrus districts.

Altogether, it looks as if the seedsman in the Yuma district, though he has all his proverbial eggs in his alfalfa basket, still has more than one string to his farm bow. Prices last year were certainly in his favor. Early hay brought good prices and later hay, better still. At the start of the season they were saying that seed would average 18 cents, but it now looks as if that were too low. To be sure, immediately after harvest, it was rumored that the United States supply was high, but nobody was stampeded into selling. Twenty cents was the wholesale level and at present writing this has advanced to twenty-three cents, for best recleaned seed.

A stabilizing influence has been the Yuma County Farm Bureau Marketing Association, a body of growers representing about 40 per cent of the seed and hay produced there. These growers refused to be frightened out of the safe position in which they saw themselves and helped maintain the price.

The association does its own selling through A. D. Cox, manager of the sales organization. It does not, however, own its own plant but depends for both recleaning and warehousing on one of the seed firms of Yuma, which has the largest cleaning plant for both alfalfa and bermuda seed in Arizona.

Threshing a part of the 3,000,000 pounds of alfalfa seed grown in the Yuma district. The straw is sold for citrus fertilizer, in many instances at a good price.

Three Varieties

Hairy Peruvian, smooth Peruvian and common varieties of alfalfa are grown in Yuma Valley, and seed is turned out from all three types. In some places, hairy Peruvian is in demand because it is said to average a ton of hay to the season more than other kinds. On the other hand, some districts object to it because, under their conditions, the stalks are coarser than the common and interfere with the quality of hay and pasture. Hairy Peruvian when first introduced brought as high as forty-five cents a pound, but now it is on the same price level as the other varieties.

Through the processes of seed production, care is taken to turn out a high quality product. When it is mature, the plant is cut early in the morning only, while the dew is still on the ground. The mowing machines have a windrow attachment which sweeps the grass into rows and men follow who toss it into small shocks. It is interesting to know that nearly all this work is done by the Yuma Indians, wards of the government, and whose land lies on the California side of the Colorado. In shocks, the seed cures for about a week, and after it is thoroughly conditioned it is hauled to a stationary machine and threshed much as are grains. Threshing costs the growers about 2 cents a pound and recleaning 45 cents a hundred. Bags cost the growers 40 cents each last year.

The seed is separated into No. 1 and No. 2 grades, the latter bringing only about half the price of the first grade. The second grade contains some minor screenings, and tests lower in germination than the best seed. All lots of seed are tested for both purity and germination. Since most of the product is sold in California, the work is done largely at the University of California, another evidence of the close relationship between this Arizona district and its California neighbors.

Yuma "points with pride," as well it may, to the fact that its No. 1 seed averages 99 per cent better in purity, while its germination test is from 85 to 90 per cent. As a district the Yuma area is practically free from all noxious weeds, and entirely so from both dodder and Johnson grass which interfere with alfalfa growing in some districts. Yuffia seed is the first to come on the market each year in the United States.

They Study Hay

CALIPATRIA.—At the monthly meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Imperial county, held here January 3, the subject of the evening was "Hay," with the principal addresses devoted to various phases of this industry.

S. E. Robinson, president of the county farm bureau and also the head of the Imperial County Hay Improvement Association, spoke concerning the present system of grading ray. He stated that in his opinion not enough interest is being taken in the subject by the growers, and he urged that more attention be devoted to the production of high-quality hay, as the alfalfa crop today is the most important in Imperial Valley.

He expressed the opinion that the day is not far distant when "the setting of prices on alfalfa hay will be done in this valley, instead of at the railroad team-tracks in Los Angeles."

M. P. Holliday of Brawley, who controls over 2000 acres of alfalfa fields and is a large shipper, said that some fields in Imperial Valley have produced more than ten tons of alfalfa hay to the acre this year, while the average is five tons as compared with the State average of less than three and a half tons.

The use of hay in ground form for chicken feed will add 50,000 tons per year to the requirements in California, he stated. Careful preparation of the soil and the adding of the proper chemical elements to produce the best product are among the requirements in growing alfalfa hay if it is to command the best price, he said.

plants. In the open ground and give them the necessary attention. If you are gardener enough to work with them from seed, there is a variety called night-scented stock, bicornis that is nothing much to look at—but it makes up for that in its delicious odor.

Sweet Williams are quaint and lovely and fragrant but they'd best be bought as plants unless you are willing to wait next year for bloom. The same is true of the gorgeous new hybrid phlox, the decussata. The colorings are a joy and they produce large heads and make excellent cut flowers. The phlox drummondi is an annual which can be grown in the open ground from seed. It is beautiful, too, and decidedly worth having.

Few perennials make a handsomer showing in the garden than the Fox Glove but it is slow coming to bloom from seed and had best be bought as a plant. The same is true of Aquilegia, or Columbine, especially the exquisite new long-spurred hybrids. Remember that these flowers like a location of partial shade, where they'll have plenty of moisture, but drainage must be good. They don't care for rich fertilizers but they do like leaf-mold. Another flower that graces any garden is the Canterbury Bell. The variety campanula medium, a biennial, can be grown from seed but it is better to sow them in seed boxes and transplant them than to sow in the open ground. The fine hybrids, the cup-and-saucer varieties, can be had from nurseries and that would save any but pretty skillful gardeners a good deal of disappointment.

There's a charming little plant that is just perfect for setting in among your shrubs for it is most effective when so planted. It is Heuchera, or coral bells—a highly descriptive name—and grown from seed readily but should be transplanted from seed flats. Give it a moist, rich loam. Geums can be effectively handled in the same way.

Buy Quality

There is a much longer list of splendid perennials than this I've suggested. They offer some more complicated culture, in many cases, than the annual. If you don't raise your own plants from seeds, a garden of them will cost more, but they have a permanency that is worth considering and which eventually offsets the additional cost. For many of them, there are simply no substitutes—they can't be happily spared from the garden. When it comes right down to it, there isn't much of an outlay required to stock a fair-sized garden with the plants. Only—if you want what you want, buy your plants from a really dependable grower and get named varieties when you possibly can. You will find it a poor investment to buy anything but healthy, vigorous plants grown from the best seeds obtainable. And don't be hesitant about asking questions as to proper soil and location and the care of your plants. A real nurseryman will want you to succeed with the plants and gladly furnish you the information.

For the Children

New interest will be lent the always worth while annual spring flower show staged by the Pasadena Horticultural Society, this year for the twenty-third consecutive time, through the innovation of a section for children's exhibits. The event will be held on April 16-17-18 and 19 in the same location it has occupied for the last three years, on Green street at the base of Garfield.

It seems that the Pasadena schools have not sufficient ground to permit of gardening activities and the entries will have to be grown by the children at their homes. This will, in a way, make the resulting display all the more interesting, for it leaves room for a good deal more individuality in the effort. According to Mrs. Winthrop Trask, manager of the amateur section, the rules will permit the parents to superintend the work the children do in growing their exhibits, just as the instructor at school might do, but the children must do the actual growing themselves.

The time selected will probably bring out an abundance of bulbous flowers, but they will all have to be set out early in order to be ready for the show. Many annuals can be sown and counted upon to be ready for the event and any number of pot-grown plants could be entered. It will be very interesting to see what sort of a showing the children's section will make in a district which is full of good gardeners, professional and amateur, and in which they have the constant advantage of the "good example" set before them.

Mrs. Trask writes that there will be small prizes given in addition to the award ribbons. G. A. Unger of Glendale will build a small pool for the child making the most points, which ought to bring out a number of contestants. A first prize will count three points, a second, two and a third, one. There are eighteen classes, eleven being for cut flowers such as "Vase of Iris," "Vase of Sweet Peas," etc. There are four classes for potted plants, both single and in collections. There is a class for miniature gardent and one for educational exhibits, such as displays of single flowers correctly labeled, and another for the rare or unusual plants.

An age limit is set from eight years to twelve, inclusive. Any additional information needed can be secured from Mrs. Trask.

No Easy Job

showier boronia elegtor, with its large pink blooms, could be planted in accompaniment to sustain interest. And speaking of pink-flowered shrubs reminds me that I saw a splendid pink variety among the bovardias, that will soon be in circulation. The blossom is larger than those on the other varieties.

Mahonia, or Oregon grape, is well known to many gardeners, but there is a variety, M. Compacta, that will prove very satisfactory because it never gets leggy or seedy as some of the other varieties incline to do.

A somewhat unusual but most attractive shrub for a protected, shady spot is Abutelon megapotemicum, grown as a standard. It has much the same effect as the fuchsia grown in standard form, the flowers being pendulant and colorful.

We see frequent use made of Grevillea Thelemannia, the variety which has the fine leaves and thick racemes of crimson flowers, small in size. It would seem that Grevillea Banksi is not so well known or it certainly would be used more. It is a particularly handsome subject, growing into a tall shrub with fern-like leaves and large clusters of red bloom, with a pleasing rapidity. It shows to best effect when planted where it is away from other plants of similar size, and really should be treated like a small tree.

Everyone in this country who knows anything at all about plants is certain to know the Spanish and Scotch brooms. They are attractive—no doubt about that—but there are two varieties, in particular, that can make even stronger claims to desirability and which are not sufficiently well known. One is Genista Fragrans, with a honey-like scent which is far more marked than in other varieties, and which gives in spring a perfect shower of small yellow blossoms. At all times the foliage is particularly lovely, something which is lacking in many of the genistas. The variety, G. Monosperma Pendula, however, which is often called the "Bridal Veil Broom," is marvelous in spring when the slender branches are set thick with tiny, pure white, fragrant blossoms. Set among other plants that have leaves to provide foliage effects when this plant is not in blossom, this sort is worth planting for the sake of its period of transitory loveliness.

I frequently pass a house where a happy combination planting of Genista Fragrans has been worked out with melanthera, one of the most favored heathers. This variety grows into a tall bush and has long sprays of lilac blossoms. It requires the touch of frost or at least good snappy weather to color the bloom perfectly and just after the recent touch of winter which visited us, these shrubs were at their best. They were, in the case I mentioned, set between bushes of Genista Fragrans. The thick mass of green foliage on the brooms set off the lilac mass of the heathers perfectly. Once the bloom is gone, these shrubs are not particularly attractive, but they would not be noticed when the genistas start to flower.

There is a host of fine heaths from which effective plantings may be chosen, among them being Erica Hyalina, dwarfish in form, but all winter and spring literally covered with spikes of tubular flowers of soft salmon pink. President Felix Faure, another variety of the same kind, has larger flowers of deep rose color, but it is not as long-lived as some of the others. Still another type of flowers is found in the Erica Persoluta, both alba and rosea. The flowers are tiny, ball-shaped, and set thickly upon the branches. The plants do not grow very tall, but they are handsome and this variety comes into bloom in early spring and lasts until into the fore part of summer.

It is impossible to more than suggest the multitude of splendid and beautiful things that you can plant. A tour of not one but several nurseries affords the only way to see for yourself what is being offered. Of course, when the flower shows come along, a notebook and pencil will be found indespensable to the visitor who is really interested in plants, for many of the nurseries make exceedingly attractive displays which include the newer things and the improvements on the older ones. This is, however, the best time of the whole year in which to set out new plants.

Newlyweds Transform Rocky Lot Into Interesting Garden

SANTA PAULA.—Last May Mr. and Mrs. George Zinnecker, newlyweds of this city, bought a lot in the Oakdale area near this city and set about the creation of a home. Seemingly the place had a great drawback—there were rocks everywhere. The ground was literally covered with them. But even rocks can be made into things of beauty in this day and age. Those in the Zinnecker front yard were left almost as they were to form the basis for a rock garden, a fish pool being built for good measure. In the center of the pool is a fountain also, needless to say, of rock. It sends up a continuous spray from a column of stones rising several feet above its base and which forms a central detail in the garden scheme.

Petunias, stocks, purple sage and such plants blended with shrubs to make one lovely, harmonious garden in this setting. To the rear of the dwelling, however, the owners created a still more interesting garden. A good collection of cactus is the feature here, with just the right proportion of rocks to add the natural effect. It was planted in one corner, while a more elaborate rock garden was designed for another, and is now under construction. An outdoors aviary is being built near by.

Mrs. Zinnecker is a member of the Santa Paula Garden Club and takes a great interest in its work.

Ever See a Fitch?

WELL, IT'S OUR NEWEST IMMIGRANT

By Chandos B. Castle

FITCH that live, move and have their being!

If you thought that fitch grew from the ground, you may take comfort from the fact that some rural English are reputed to call vetch "fitch."

But there is no excuse for wandering about in Southern California, the Paradise of strange, unusual crops, insisting that fitch is something one douses on one's hair.

We have been to see a new animal, the fitch, and herewith append certain notes, as well as a photograph or two to prove, at the very least, that we saw something.

K. Vanderbilt, of Bell and Big Bear, is the breeder and importer of this small Teutonic fur animal. Built along sinuous lines, it is distinctly in the weasel class. Its reason for having been put on earth, one gathers from the owner, is to supply homo sapiens (P.) with a cream-colored fur neck piece, nicely stippled with the dark brown of the longer "guard hairs," and sufficiently expensive to satisfy the most esthetic.

Here it is, the fitch, a German immigrant, posing for its picture.

Mr. Vanderbilt, who is conversant also with fox and mink farming, lists a number of things about the fitch which appeal to him over, say, the mink. Chief among them is the prolificacy of the little mammals with the funny name. They breed, he says, twice a year, litters running from six to twelve young. They are ready either to breed or pelt at from six to seven months of age.

There are a few at Bell—including some ghostly pink-eyed albinos—some bred in the United States, some recently imported from Europe. There are quite a number at Mr. Vanderbilt's mountain place, where they get along famously in the snow, the owner reports.

They are quite uncommon in this country, he says. He knows of but one other breeder of the animal in the whole nation.

The chief difficulty in importing the fitch is in the quarantine regulations enforced by our government and Mr. Vanderbilt has had his share of trouble getting the

While meek, raw or cooked, in its favorite dish, the fitch is quite civilized, and will eat vegetables, raw or cooked, cooked oats, whole-wheat bread, raw bran, shredded wheat biscuit, or dog biscuit, milk, eggs, and even cod liver oil, which last is even more than a lot of Uncle John's lovely little disciples will do without hollering.

Small breeding pens are necessary, as well as a large runway, where all the young can be kept.

One marked characteristic should be noted before this fitch epic is closed. The fitch and the whangdoodle, for all we know, may have points of similarity, but there is one sharp difference. The fitch doth not mourn, but grins "like a skunk in a gale of wind"—and no sire of the herd or flock, or whatever it is, is so weighted with maturity and dignity that he cannot play with his fellows, gracefully, actively, like a kitten. And this the writer can aver, for, like Marco Polo, he hath been and seen.

Keep blasting caps and detonating fuses under lock and key. If not, you may blind or kill some child, for children do not choose playthings wisely.

South America may be an agricultural competitor, but she is also a great field for our export trade. Remarkable developments may be expected in that continent.

K. Vanderbilt, of Bell and Big Bear, hands over a little snack—in this case a bit of a date—to one of his playful, friendly fitches. Mr. Vanderbilt says they're a relief after managing foxes and minks.

Ventura County Farm Bureau in New Membership Drive

VENTURA.—Ventura county's farm bureau membership has grown from 192 in 1924 to 828 at the close of 1929, it was announced recently by J. D. Culbertson, chairman of the membership committee.

The bureau was organized in Ventura county in 1924, and so profitable has been its existence that every year has seen a larger following. The year after its organization, the membership jumped to 610. In 1926 it went to 660; in 1927, to 770, and in 1929, to 828. The goal set this year is 900.

The Intercounty Walnut Growers' Institute is to be held on February 15 at the Ventura Union High School, under the joint auspices of the intercounty walnut growers' department of the farm bureau and the agricultural extension service. The most recent institute to be held in Ventura county was held in the spring of 1926 in Santa Paula, with an attendance of 700.

It's Better to Buy Plants Than to Do Without Our Perennials

A GOOD many people pass by the perennials in selecting plants for their gardens because they want quick results and the very name of the class indicates that they will have to wait over a season, perhaps, before they have any flowers from their plantings. And yet, when we stop to think how many of the loveliest and most desirable flowers belong in that class, passing it by is no easy matter. We are fortunate, however, in having a good many varieties which will really give us bloom the first season from seed, and in addition, we always have the possibility of getting plants from the nurserymen which can be set in our gardens and depended upon to lend their beauty to them in due time.

There is the good, old faithful Coreopsis, ready to supply us with quantities of graceful yellow blossoms with so little encouragement! Better plant it; it may look commonplace when the garden is rioting in all sorts of other flowers but the time will come when it will be a godsend, and it truly is a most decorative flower when you take pains to put it in the right sort of vase or bowl.

Not so well-known, but a delight to those who have made its acquaintance, the Iceland Poppy is another perennial which can be sown in open ground, thinned out later and relied upon to give abundantly of its golden yellow blossoms over a long period of time. They keep, after cutting, much better than most of the poppies, too.

The salvias, sown once the ground warms up, will reward you with quick growth and lots of bloom. The familiar S. superdens is a brilliant red; in S. Azurea grandiflora and S. Farinacea, we have the charming light blue flowers, while S. Patens gives us a deep rich shade of blue, almost navy in tone.

The soft frenchy blue of the little Agathea is almost indespensable for it is the perfect "mixer" with Cecil Brunner roses and many other flowers. It will grow quite readily from seed to bloom in its first season. So will Anchusa—the Italian Dropmore variety for best results—and another source of the always wanted blue flowers. And do spare a corner for some thalictrum dipterocarpum. The name is enough to stun one but, nevertheless, just grow some once and use it for mixing in your bouquets and you'll forgive its name. It likes a well-drained spot but wants plenty of moisture just the same. The plant grows tall and bushy and is covered with rosy-lilac flowers, smallish ones.

Plants Save Time

You'll want some petunias, of course. There are massively frilled giant types that really are most effective grown in pots, but they can be used in beds if you prefer them that way. They are tricky to pull through all the infant stages and it isn't a bad plan to buy young plants from the nurseryman and let him do the worrying. However, there are a lot of spicy, colorful varieties than can be easily grown from seed if you follow the planting directions. For low bedding effects, they have yet to introduce anything that is more winsome than the dwarf types such as Rosy Morn—which looks just like the name sounds. There is a new, enchanting shade of blue, almost the color of the Agathea daisy, called Silver Blue. As a combination planting these two are perfect, but you might have trouble getting that Silver Blue. I hear that there is a very limited supply of the seed this year.

Plant Fragrance

Speaking of the spiciness of petunias brings to mind other perennials and some annuals that anyone would do well to add to his garden, if only for the sake of that fragrance, often most haunting at night. The scent of stocks, phlox, alyssum and the like can bring infinite charm to evening hours if planted near the porches or in the patio or wherever you "live" in your garden.

All the stocks are more or less fragrant. There are several good types, and many can be had, as young plants, from the nurserymen in case you don't care to grow them in seed boxes and transplant, or sow

The modern version of the old favorite perennial phlox is a gorgeous one, supplying continuous bloom throughout the summer and holding over for successive seasons.

Selecting's No Easy Job When There's So Much to Attract You

YEAR after year the available ornamentals shown in California nurseries are increased by newer improved varieties of old favorites and by introductions from other countries until it has become a matter of positive pain to select a reasonable planting for our homes. We are so attracted to them, so filled with a desire to possess them, that the boundary lines of most properties would have to be very elastic to comfortably hold all we might chose if allowed a free hand.

Long before I really knew what the term meant, I was fascinated by the term I encountered in old English literature, "pleached alley," and even more by the pictures I occasionally found which showed such plantings. Here in Southern California, where the sun can get so hot, a pleached alley would lend delight and comfort to any garden where it could be given space. For such a purpose we have at last been offered what looks like the ideal plant—Grewia occidentalis prostrata. It sends its branches out from the main trunk in a horizontal fashion, at quite regular intervals and on opposite sides. For that reason the plant may be comfortably trained, espalier style, against a chimney or a wall, if such a planting is desired; but given a bit of support, it can be shaped perfectly for the pleached alley—and there you are. It is abloom a great part of the year with star-like flowers of delicate orchid color, about an inch in diameter.

Boronias are attractive shrubs in themselves, but the variety megastigma, with the ordinary-looking brown flowers, can well be planted for the sake of the heavenly fragrance it gives to the garden. The

Ever See a Fitch?

WELL, IT'S OUR NEWEST IMMIGRANT

By Chandos B. Castle

FITCH that! live, move and have their being!
If you thought that itch grew from the ground, you may take comfort

Beets have to be thinned in order that they may become fat, and the work has to be done largely by hand labor, but there are several methods that can be used and Orange county growers are trying to decide which one is best of all.

Ways to Thin Beets

TO INCREASE, NOT REDUCE, THEIR GIRTH

DEMONSTRATION beet thinning plots conducted during the past season by the agricultural extension service and the Holly Sugar Company in Orange county have resulted in some interesting cost and yield data, it is reported by Eric E. Eastman, assistant farm adviser of Orange county, and R. H. Tallman, field superintendent of the sugar company, who kept the records for 1929.

Two series of demonstrations were established, with three methods of thinning practiced in each. They were located on the Edwards and Lucera ranches west of here.

Plot No. 1 at the Edwards ranch utilized the standard method consisting of blocking and thinning two rows simultaneously with a short-handled hoe, the thinner proceeding on his knees. The cost in this plot was $5 per acre the yield 5.9 tons per acre, and the field income $53.22.

Plot No. 2 at the same ranch was thinned by the one-row method. This experimental method consists of thinning as above, one row at a time instead of two rows; the principle involved being that a more uniform blocking can be secured, and more attention paid to the "big beet." The cost in this plot was $7 per acre, the yield 7.21 tons, and the income $67.23.

Plot No. 3 was thinned by the long-hoe method. In this method the blocker proceeds on foot down one row at a time, using a long handled, or standard hoe. The thinner follows on his knees, pulling all but the "big beet" from the block. The cost of the long hoe operations this year is considered excessive, and it is hoped that it may be reduced so as not to exceed $9 in the 1930 laber contracts. The cost was $17.50 per acre; the yield 8.02 tons, the income $74.79.

On the Lucera ranch the same thinning treatments were given. The results were:

Plot 1—Standard—cost, $5 per acre; yield, 5.45 tons; income, $51.28; plot 2—One row method—cost, $7 per acre; yield, 6.94; income, $65.34; plot 3—Long hoe method—cost $17.50 per acre; yield, 5.56 tons; income, $52.32.

Conclusions cannot be reached on the basis of one season's work, but it appears likely that the long hoe method, properly supervised will prove the best.

Orange county had an acreage of 10,600 in sugar beets last season. Owing to the drought and heat of early summer the yield and the sugar content were reduced below the average of the past few years.

The sugar beet industry is favored by the State-wide conferences which are held in two sections, one in the northern part of the State with C. L. Ploda as chairman, and the other in the southern part with J. W. Rooney of Oxnard as chairman. Dr. W. W. Robbins of the University Farm at Davis is the secretary of both groups. Three conferences were held in the south during 1929. Representatives of sugar factories, the United States Department of Agriculture, and the agricultural extension service make up the conference. The work being done by each of these agencies in regard to crop rotations, fertilizers and cultural practices is reported and discussed. These conferences enable the industry and associated agencies to keep "up to date" on the most recent scientific and practical sugar beet investigations, and to work together for the betterment of the industry.

The study of the nematode problem is also under way and with the thinning trials and investigation of crop rotation data, together with possible trial plots on the latter subject, will constitute the basis for the work in 1930.

Modern Convenience

HERE'S A FARM WITH WARM WATER HEAT

THERMAL.—Snappy midwinter finds Southern California growers of perishables busy with their various devices for checking the inroads of Jack Frost, but Joe Kitagawa, a Japanese farmer in Coachella Valley, leaves the job to Nature. On his ranch in the Oasis district water comes from the ground at 102 degrees and whenever the temperature falls to 36, Mr. Kitagawa simply starts his pump, and the warm water goes steaming up his rows of plants. Mr. Kitagawa's winter specialty is eggplant. In order to surprise housewives with this delicacy in out-of-season months he has to keep an eye on the thermometer every half hour after midnight during cold nights. It isn't any snap he has even if Nature has been kind about the water. The average easterner would regard December eggplant as "simply another California story."

This eggplant is planted in September and is usually kept bearing until well into January. Then it is allowed to die down, and is topped. But just as soon as the weather starts warming up it springs into new life. The second season of production begins about April and continues until the customary summer price slump. The winter prices often run as high as 25 cents a pound, which makes the growing of so weighty a vegetable a very worth-while venture.

There is a Japanese variety of eggplant on this ranch that is getting watchful care. It is different in leaf, and has the fruit the size of small peppers, though having the typical purplish coloring.

Mr. Kitagawa grows a pea which is eaten pods and all. It looks quite like the ordinary variety when the peas are just starting to form, and is tender and appetizing. It makes an attractive plant for the blossoms resemble the purple sweet pea in color, though somewhat smaller. Blooming in mid-December, these peas are a real novelty.

The naturally warm water is an asset in another branch of Mr. Kitagawa's farming, pepper growing. In years past, before the Mexican Bell came into the winter markets, he covered as many as three acres with canvas and produced the fruit for a very high market, but with the influx of the Mexican product such an expensive method was not warranted. However, he does grow plants during the cold weather under canvas, to be set out in late February. Since an acre uses 12,000 plants, and he plants ten acres, many little peppers have to be up and sprouted quite large. Canvas coverings fifty feet square are used to protect them against the cold, and when, on a nippy morning, water at 102 degrees is turned in, these temporary hothouses throw off a cloud of steam.

Tomatoes under the ordinary wigwams, as well as ordinary peas, enter into the yearly scheme of things, but permanent crops are growing too—grapefruit and dates—for the forty acres of the holding belongs to the Kitagawa family through citizenship.

Bolstering the Grape

BY-PATHS TO CONSUMER HELP VINEYARDIST

ONE way of bolstering the grape producing business is to find all possible avenues to the consumer, and even by-paths, if necessary. Prof. W. V. Cruess of the Fruit Products Laboratory, University of California, is one of the byway hunters, his specialty being novel and hitherto neglected products and by-products.

Just lately Prof. Cruess's group has been publishing some of its findings in regard to grape products either originated or tested in the Fruit Products Laboratory. The university, naturally, is not in a position to undertake the commercial manufacture and sale of grape products, and must rely upon the industry itself to put the results of its investigations to practical use.

In co-operation with an ice-cream factory and store in Berkeley, the laboratory tried out, commercially, a frozen red grape syrup or concentrate, tinctured with orange and lemon syrups, and sold in waxed cartons or friction top cans, or packed in cans like ice cream. The Berkeley firm found a remarkable demand for it, at 30 cents a pint, 60 cents a quart, and Berkeley will continue to have it available. Known purity, real merit, convenience and moderate price give it apparent commercial security.

Frozen grapes in syrup, which in the laboratory retained fresh color and flavor, are to be offered experimentally in San Francisco this winter. Thawed and rinsed, they are served as fresh grapes. They lack the crispness of new grapes, but are satisfactory as a table fruit.

Syrups Improved

Table syrups made from grapes have been too highly concentrated in the past, and have lost the grape flavor through too much refining, it seems. This has been corrected by the laboratory. Tried on the housewives of Berkeley, the Muscat-flavored syrup was pronounced superior by the majority to one made from raisins, and another made of grapes but flavored with imitation maple. More than 100,000,000 gallons of sorghum and cane syrups are used annually. It would require 2,500,000 tons of grapes to produce an equivalent amount of table syrup. The laboratory believes, however, that the grape syrup should be of high quality, to compete with the better grades of imitation maple syrup. Red grape concentrate, at 68 to 70 degrees Balling sugar content, makes an excellent table syrup itself, it was found, needing no added flavoring or neutralization of the acid. Pasteurized in sealed cans, it will keep satisfactorily.

A "ginger ale" of Muscat syrup and ginger ale extract was also made, the reason for the experiment being the growing popularity of ginger ale in the United States. The laboratory found this satisfactory as a beverage. It is recommended it be sold as a high-class product, not as a 5-cent little bottle

"Creamed grape," that is, crystallized grape syrup, makes an excellent spread for hot biscuits, or for cake filling and like uses. It is made by vacuum concentration, cooling, seeding and filling into jelly glasses, where it crystallizes. It keeps indefinitely.

Powdered grape juice was also made. An interesting point is that the yeasts present go right along with the powder, cause no damage to the dry product, but, according to the laboratory, cause "rapid spoilage on dilution of the product with water." The laboratory had to add corn sugar before it could get the grape sugars to dry properly.

Improvement of grape juices by removing excess cream of tartar, the making of good grape jelly candy, and the recommendation that frozen grape and other fruit juices be dispensed from house to house like, or even with, dairy products, are among other activities noted in the report.

A Record Pack

Cannery Starts Anew on Putting Up Vegetable Iron

SAN FERNANDO.—With the spinach pack now under way, the Fernando Canning Company is rounding out a record-breaking year, according to G. E. Grier, president. During the past year, 1000 tons of apricots, 1200 tons of peaches, and 8000 tons of tomatoes were packed. The spinach pack last spring, at the beginning of the season, equaled about 1000 tons, also.

The pack of 8000 tons of tomatoes is regarded as a record, according to Mr. Grier. During the season 10,000,000 cans were required to take care of the fruit and vegetables. Most of the canned article is shipped to the Middle West and East, though there are consignments now ready for England.

The cannery paid out approximately $150,000 to tomato growers in this section of the valley, and a like amount for help.

black walnut trees growing in the canyon. It was Mr. Biedermann who first found and reported the black walnut fly that was subsequently given the scientific name of rhagoletis juglandis; later he made the further discovery that the common name connecting it with the black walnut was incorrect as he has never been able to find the insect working on the native species.

Although anticipating that we might unearth something unexpected, neither Mr. Boyce nor myself was prepared for the surprise we got when our first glimpse of the black walnut fly showed that it was not the fly we had been fighting in their own State. It had markings that in a general way were similar and it appeared to be closely related, but there were several outstanding differences which precluded the possibility of its being the same insect. In addition, specimens of another fruit fly found working on the walnuts in a similar manner were taken for identification.

The next step was to determine again the identity of the walnut husk-fly in California. To do this, Mr. Boyce sent specimens of the insects from both States to the entomologist who had originally described the black walnut fly, E. T. Cresson, Jr., of Philadelphia. He very promptly pronounced the California walnut husk-fly a new insect, and supplied the name that has been given. The second fly found in Arizona was also a new one, to which he gave the name of rhagoletis boycei in honor of Mr. Boyce.

A. M. Boyce, entomologist of the University of California, and C. R. Biedermann, pioneer walnut grower of Southern Arizona, on the latter's ranch.

The cause of the error made in identifying the specimens sent to Washington in 1928 is not at this time entirely understood. It really is not surprising when one considers that the two flies belong to the same genus, attack the same host, and are found in adjoining States.

Beet Acreage Grows

OXNARD.—Recent rains which have greatly changed the outlook of agriculture in Ventura county have made a decided difference in the prospects of the coming sugar beet crop, according to J. W. Rooney, manager of the local factory of the American Beet Sugar Company.

With a dry fall in 1929 and poor prospects of rain for early 1930, the belief early in January of this year was that the total acreage signed up for the growing of sugar beets would be far below last year's mark. On January 10, the total signed up was 7000 acres under last year's. But since the recent rainfall the situation has changed and, according to Mr. Rooney, there is every reason to believe that this year's beet acreage will equal if not exceed that of last year, which recorded a total of around 11,000 acres.

The largest beet acreage in any one district centers around Oxnard, according to local factory officials, while acreage under contract to the local plant extends from Santa Barbara on one side to the Chino district, and beyond, on the other. Although last year was considered dry, the tonnage and sugar percentage of beets received at the Oxnard plant were good. With conditions improving generally, it is expected that growers will receive fairly good returns for their 1929 crops. The initial payment, based on the contract price, sugar selling at $5, which totaled close to $1,000,000, has already been made to growers by the local factory. Just when the next payment will be made depends upon market conditions and sugar sales, according to factory officials. The final payment may not be made until July, it is said.

While there is much talk of possible expansion of the Oxnard plant so that it may refine Philippine cane sugar, imported in raw form, no information pertaining thereto is forthcoming from any of the local factory officials. Philippine raw sugar has been successfully refined at the Oxnard plant, according to reports. In any case the status of beet sugar will not be changed, it is believed. The factory owns about 5000 acres in the Oxnard district, much of which is planted to beets each year, and owns a considerable acreage in the Chino district as well. It is expected that between 2000 and 3000 acres will be planted to beets by the factory itself for the coming season, as was done in 1929.

Herbaceous Plants

Herbaceous plants are divided into three classes, annuals, biennials and perennials. The annuals are the ones which grow from seed, flower and die in the same season. They are, in turn, placed in three groups, the hardy, half-hardy—and tender. Those which are hardy will endure severe frosts; the half-hardy will survive light frosts; the tender will be easily killed by the slightest touch of frost.

Biennials are those plants which grow one season, survive the winter, bloom the second year and then die. Many of the hardy biennials are grown as perennials because they bloom the first year and then continue to reseed themselves.

A perennial is longer lived, slower to develop and will survive the severest winter. Their tops sometimes are winter-killed, but they grow up anew from the roots which are unharmed.

If you have hardwood ashes, save them for the garden as they are a valuable source of potash and some spot in your garden will benefit greatly by the addition of such ashes.

The quickest action in nitrogenous fertilizers can be had from using nitrate of soda. The simplest way to handle this is to dissolve it in an equal part of boiling water. Mix this solution with ten times the volume of ashes or fine, dry soil and then scatter it evenly among your plants.

Show Date Set

The annual mid-winter flower show at Encinitas will be held February 19 to 23, inclusive. This year, as in previous years, T. P. McLoughlin will be manager. The Encinitas show is one of the very attractive events which annually ushers in the new year's floral season.

ULTIMATUM ON WATER

Imperial Seeks Whole Flow

Agricultural Interests Ask 4,600,000 Acre Feet as Their Minimum Need

Session With Metropolitan Board Here This Week Proposed by Valley

EL CENTRO, Feb. 2. (Exclusive) Representatives of Coachella Valley in joint session here this afternoon defined their position in the pinch outlook over the allocation of Colorado River water to lower basin claimants when they instructed Earl C. Pound, member of the California Colorado River Commission, to demand 4,600,000 acre feet as the minimum amount acceptable to the agricultural interests of Southern California. The "agricultural interests" are defined as Imperial, Coachella and Palo Verde valleys.

In this outline the agricultural interests showed themselves as adamant in the position taken by Pound at the Reno conference. This demand, if granted, would mean that the agricultural interests would be given the legal right to 4,400,000 acre feet which is the allotment of California and the Metropolitan Water District would have to take its share with the surplus waters estimated at 600,000 acre feet. In other words, the total amount of water to be allotted will not meet the requirements set up by individual groups within California.

THESE OUTLINED

Also the representatives of the Imperial district are willing to come to this division of California's water allotment, it will be necessary to pass the water demand made by the Arizona commissioners.

It is now proposed by Arizona for payment of the lower basin water that the Nevada conference was for, that Arizona should take all of the waters from Colorado tributaries flowing through the state proper, that the 7,500,000 acre feet allotted as Class A water should be protected—4,400,000 acre feet to Southern California, 2,800,000 feet to Arizona and 300,000 acre feet to Nevada, and that the first 1,000,000 acre feet of surplus, defined as Class B water, should be divided equally between California and Arizona; that additional surplus, if any is estimated at 600,000 acre feet which is defined as Class C water, should also be divided equally between California and Arizona are to receive equally any water that may be required for Mexico.

According to today's agreement at the joint meeting here, this would be acceptable to Imperial and Coachella valleys if California should build east of the coast range a dam to control the 4,400,000 acre feet of flow water. Pound,

Will Rogers Remarks:

S.S. ILE DE FRANCE, Feb. 2. [To the Editor of The Times:] I have nothing to say and feel in no shape to say it in if I did have. Lindbergh's ocean is as sore at the world as a defeated candidate. When I hinted that I would fly back if I could, I received a lot of cables offering to take me on, among them Mrs. Keith Miller, one of our best air-shes. My wife is not jealous, but she just never did like to have me stay out over the ocean all night with a strange woman, or even a friendly woman. If we could have got in before dark she wouldn't have minded. Course we could have taken a chaperon, but not as much gas, and gas is more beneficial on a trip like that than a chaperon. It was just unfortunate all 'round.

Yours,
WILL ROGERS.

MANY SLAIN BY WAHABI HORSEMEN

About 450 Tribesmen in Transjordania Lose Lives in Recent Attacks

LONDON, Feb. 2. (AP)—Exchange Telegraph dispatches from Jerusalem report that about 450 tribesmen have been killed during recent attacks by Wahabi horsemen from the Nejd on Transjordanian tribes.

Col. Peake, British commander of the Arab Legion, has left Amman, capital of Transjordania, for Maan to head off the Wahabi horsemen.

Fearing the menace of repeated Wahabi raids, the Transjordanian tribesmen were reported to be moving into the neighborhood of towns for shelter and protection by the British-commanded Arab Legion. Most of the casualties in the latest raid were suffered by the Huweitats and another tribe in Wadi Sirhan.

Portugal Hit by New Storms

LISBON (Portugal) Feb. 2. (AP)—Torrential rains, snowfalls and floods today ravaged Portugal, intensifying the calamities which the country has suffered from storms in the last month.

Arctic weather prevailed throughout the north. Three peasants were frozen to death. Wire connections with several parts of the nation have broken down as a result of the terrific storms.

THOUSANDS IN PROTEST

Filipinos Weep at Rally

"Humiliation Day" Services in Manila Conducted as Mourning Rites

San Francisco Has Attack, With Victim Requiring Hospital Treatment

MANILA, Feb. 2. (AP)—Today was observed as "National Humiliation Day" by about 10,000 Filipinos who gathered for services protesting against recent anti-Filipino demonstrations at Watsonville, San Francisco and San Jose, Cal. Disturbances at Watsonville resulted in the death of a Filipino.

The meeting was orderly as the crowd, wearing for the most part black mourning bands, gathered at the foot of the monument to Jose Rizal, Filipino patriot. Speeches in English, Spanish and Tagalog caused many to weep.

PLEA TO HOOVER

Veterans of the Filipino Revolution, in annual convention here, adopted a resolution calling on President Hoover to protect Filipinos in America against aggressions such as those at Watsonville. Another resolution indorsed the King independence bill.

The veterans' society re-elected Emilio Aguinaldo, Filipino leader, as president.

The speakers at the services included Dean Jorge Bocobo of the college of law of the University of the Philippines, Representative Tomas Confesor, Representative Francisco Varona, Father Mercado and the Tagalog poets, Florentino Collantes and Jose Corazon Dejesus.

The latter sounded the only radical note of the gathering. He said that Filipinos have been seeking independence peaceably but will change their tactics if necessary.

PRESS GIVES LITTLE SPACE

Dean Bocobo, author of the manifesto of protest adopted last Thursday at a meeting of educators, legislators and labor leaders, said that the "tragic situation" resulting from the anti-Filipino riots in California will bring home to the minds of the American people "the failure of the American experiment in the Philippines."

Bocobo said the California race war may be a part of "the inscrutable design of Providence for some divine purpose." Further, he said that "despised as an inferior race and deprived of equal economic opportunities, how can we Filipinos accept our present status under the American flag? Would we be worthy of our sacred past and any glorious future if we didn't protest against the humiliating events in America?" he asked.

Seeking to calm feelings concerning the California disturbances, newspapers gave comparatively little space to the meeting.

BUS BOY BEATEN WITH HEAVY WEAPON

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 2. (Exclusive)—San Francisco police were confronted today by a new attack upon a Filipino on a street by a group of Americans. The Filipino suffered a laceration of the head which necessitated treatment at an emergency hospital.

Elsewhere throughout California, according to reports tonight, the week-end has been free of conflicts or demonstrations against the islanders. Precautions were taken in centers of Filipino labor to guard against clashes, and to prevent the Filipinos from mingling with whites at public dances.

The newest San Francisco report to police of an attack on a Filipino lists Augustine Vallego, 20 years of age, a bus boy, as being hit on the head with some heavy weapon at midnight, when set upon by a trio of intoxicated whites. He was taken to Central Emergency Hospital, treated and sent home.

Girl Gives Life in Futile Effort to Save Mother

HASTINGS (Minn.) Feb. 2. (AP)—Miss Helen Swanson, 21 years of age, a senior at Hamline University at St. Paul, home for a week-end visit, today gave her life in a fruitless attempt to aid her mother, Mrs. P. A. Swanson. Both the daughter and her mother died in a hospital from burns received yesterday.

Mrs. Swanson was cleaning clothes with gasoline on a porch at her home here late yesterday. The fumes caused her to faint and she fell over the pan containing the gasoline, saturating her clothes. Helen found her mother and carried her into the house. As they passed the kitchen stove, the heat set fire to Mrs. Swanson's clothes. Helen then rushed her mother outside, where the flames were extinguished in the snow. Both were burned fatally.

Germans Urged to Drink Milk

BERLIN, Feb. 2. (AP)—Christened with a bottle of foaming milk, a balloon was sent up on an endurance flight today by Dr. Dietrich, Minister of Food and Agriculture, as a propaganda stunt to urge greater consumption of milk instead of beer and other alcoholic drinks upon the Berlin citizens.

SOCIETY DAMES STAGE BOUT

Touch of Ill-Nature Makes All World Kin, Too; Social Register Divorcees "Mix It"

NEW YORK, Feb. 2. (Exclusive)—A story of two haughty, bejeweled grande dames of the Social Register battling like fishwives over a borrowed clothes line, was revealed when they staged a legal return bout in Yorkville Police Court.

They are Mrs. Florence Bonnell, one of the smartest matrons of the Syosset, L. I., younger set, and Mrs. Dorothy Stuart Fargo, divorced wife of the grandson of the Fargo who founded Wells Fargo & Co.

Magistrate Goodman listened wearily to such gracious platitudes as "sock in the face" and "low-down woman." And George Gordon Battle and Robert C. Rand, attorneys, who prefer sterner stuff, crossed rapiers repeatedly and nobly in behalf of the two angry exwives.

The question was: Did Mrs. Fargo, once Dottie Stuart, prettiest of debutantes, last June, put the slap on Mrs. Bonnell inside the prim, chaste portals of the Women's Exchange Restaurant in Madison avenue after angry words failed both women?

There was a husband in the woodpile, it was revealed when Mrs. Bonnell bore witness. She was suing her husband, George Frey Bonnell, high-flying broker, and the charming Mrs. Fargo, co-respondent in the Bonnell divorce action, for $150,000 in stock which she asserts they withheld from her after she gave the securities to Bonnell.

Although Mrs. Fargo's address also is on Madison avenue, she is there so rarely that when Mrs. Bonnell spied her in the restaurant she immediately telephoned process servers.

They dropped papers on Mrs. Fargo's table beside her two children, one 5 years of age and the other 6. Mrs. Bonnell and her sister, Frances Adele Carnochan of the Savoy Plaza, waited in the vestibule and testified that Mrs. Fargo came out waving the papers and shouting:

"I'll be there."

"I guess you will," Mrs. Bonnell said she replied, whereupon she asserts Mrs. Fargo slapped her soundly twice and sped away.

"I did not slap her, I only pushed her."

BOMB BLAST IN THEATER STARTS RIOT

Chicago Outrage Perils Lives of 300 Women and Children in Audience

CHICAGO, Feb. 2. (AP)—Three hundred persons, most of them women and children, were panic-stricken today when a bomb exploded in the rear of a motion-picture theater at Hinsdale, a suburb. Mrs. George W. Krueger, wife of the theater manager, helped calm the stampeding patrons by a talk from the stage, and Rev. Richard J. Lee, Episcopal rector, rushed to the scene when he heard the blast and reassured the crowds who were trying to fight their way from the front door. Damage was slight.

Mrs. Krueger blamed the bombing on the motion-picture operators' union which, she said, had threatened her husband for not employing two operators. He runs the projector himself, she said, and recalled that he was shot in the leg by one of three men as he was leaving a film exchange.

GROUND HOG "CHUCKS" JOB

"Six More Weeks of Winter," He Says With Yawn Warning He'll Wait Until April 1 Next Year

CANOE RIDGE WEATHER WORKS, PUNXSUTAWNEY (Pa.) Feb. 2. (AP)—Br'er Ground Hog, ancient prognosticator of the weather, issued from his den this morning a little after 7 o'clock, took a hasty glance around and asserted there will be six more weeks of winter conditions.

Further, the seer of seers gave out a more important announcement as he glimpsed his shadow on a snowbank.

The announcement was given to the world by the renowned prophet that henceforth he will not get up in the middle of his winter sleep to give out the same old line of dope about six more weeks of winter. He said that in the future the first of April will be the day he will emerge from winter quarters and make a forecast.

"For more than 1,000,000 years," the seer said disgustedly as he rubbed his eyes and gazed at the faithful gathered about his burrow to get the ultimate word, "I have been getting up in the middle of the winter to satisfy the curiosity of a passel of human pests wanting to know whether they could lay aside their heavies. I'm getting old. I'm sick of it. This is the last time. Come around April 1 after this."

"But what about the pretender from Quarryville?" anxiously inquired Frank Boney who had plodded up the ridge to greet the old buck at his midwinter awakening.

"Just a cheap fakir," replied the ground hog, who appeared bored and somewhat offended that any one should bring up the Quarryville fellow who has been trying to steal his stuff for several seasons past. "He's an upstart in the same class with the goose bone, squirrel fur and other prognosticators of that ilk. Forget him. I give out the weather."

As he waddled back into his cave to finish his winter nap, he said, "Good-by, boys, until April 1, 1931." Frank Boney opined, however, that next year's forecast will be given February 2, regardless of the old chuck's ultimatum.

THREE DIE WHEN GAS PIPE OPENS

Ten Others Overcome by Frost-Cracked Main in Baltimore Street

BALTIMORE, Feb. 2. (AP)—Three persons were killed and ten overcome here today by gas fumes escaping from a four-inch gas main broken by frost. The dead were all members of one family. Six of those overcome lived in adjoining houses and four were firemen who responded with resuscitating apparatus.

The dead are: Henry Witzler, 69 years of age; his wife, Mary Witzler, 69, and their son, Patrick Witzler. Their bodies were discovered by firemen.

Presence of the gas was detected by Miss Lauretta King, who was awakened by the coughing of her 4-year-old step brother, Earl Bayne. She found her mother and stepfather overcome and notified the police.

Fire department ambulances were rushed to the scene and in an adjoining house, Mrs. Eva Siske and her daughter Eva were found overcome. The ten who suffered from the effects of the gas were taken to hospitals and all but four were able to return to their homes later in the day.

Three Youths Killed as Fast Train Hits Auto

EARLIMART, Feb. 2. (AP)—The lives of three youths, all from Alpaugh, were snuffed out this afternoon when the northbound San Joaquin Flyer of the Southern Pacific crashed into the automobile in which they were riding.

The dead were: Clarence Cooley, 17 years of age; Louis Martin, 16, and Lester Alcorn, 16.

Officers state that the boys were watching a freight train which was clearing for the flyer and did not see the onrushing passenger train until it was upon them.

Martin is the third grown boy of his family to have been killed or died in the last four years.

FOG MENACE OVERCOME

Plane Landings Safeguarded

Los Angeles Man's Invention Rights Acquired by Ford and Stout

Radio Device Guides Craft to Field and Gives Actual Distance From Ground

BY ROBERT B. ARMSTRONG
"Times" Staff Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2. (Exclusive)—At last electrical experts have found a way to eliminate the menace of fog in the operation of airplanes and the new device perfected by Earl C. Hanson of Los Angeles with the financial support of some Southern California interests, is soon to be adopted by the Ford and Stout all-metal airplanes in commercial operations. Aviation experts have learned that the Ford and Stout interests have obtained the interests in the Hanson patents formerly held by Los Angeles capitalists and that in a short time all Stout and Ford planes will be completely equipped with this new electrical fog-baffling device which will permit perfect landing on any field properly wired in the heaviest fog known.

RADIO PILOT

Radio is thus to serve as the means of obliterating one of the greatest of the hazards of flying—location of a landing field in fog. Earl C. Hanson of Los Angeles, holder of a large number of radio patents dating from prewar days to the present time, using a miniature replica of the standard equipment, divulged in Chicago recently an approved system for bringing an airplane safely into the airport regardless of the weather conditions.

The new development has taken several years to reach the point where it is practical. It is an exemplification of the cable-piloting method of guiding ships through mined harbors, another of Mr. Hanson's developments, which gave service during the World War, when the inventor was on the radio development staff of the United States Navy. Later it was proposed to utilize the same method for establishing aircraft lanes across country, using the power lines as the means of carrying the generated signals.

PRINCIPLES SIMPLE

The fundamental principles underlying the operation of the landing system are relatively simple. Cables formed into single turn loops diverge from a common point just outside the boundary of the airport. At the apex of the open end cone formed by the two cables there is a three-turn coil 200 feet wide and 400 feet long known as the gun coil. The loops are for the purpose of directing the pilot toward the gun coil, while the gun coil serves to inform the pilot just how high he is from the ground by means of an inductive altimeter that Mr. Hanson also has developed.

The loops forming the sides of the open-end cone are supplied with an audio-frequency impulse generated by a 1000-cycle generator at the ground station. The circuit through one of the loops is connected through a chopper which alternately opens and closes the circuit, so that there is a series of dashes whereas the other loop has impressed upon it another broken 1000-cycle impulse in which the breaks are of shorter duration to form a series of dots.

ACTUAL HEIGHT GIVEN

The signals from the two loops are picked up by the pilot in the ship and the intensity of the signals indicates his relative position with reference to the field. When he is flying directly in the center of the cone the intensity of the signals is equal and there is a constant 1000-cycle note in his head phones. Knowing that he is directly on the course he flies ahead over the gun coil. The stronger signal passing through the gun coil is greater than that from the single-turn loops and operates the Han-

Two Dozen Have Incomes of More Than $10,000,000; Hundreds Millionaires

Unprecedented Prosperity of 1928 Revealed in Data on Tax Payments

BY LAURENCE M. BENEDICT
"Times" Staff Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2. (Exclusive)—A tale of growing riches completely overshadowing everything in the previous financial history of the nation was unfolded today by the Treasury Department in its publication of statistics of incomes for 1928, upon which taxes were paid last year.

It had been expected that the figures would show an unprecedented prosperity in 1928, but even the most optimistic were amazed at the extraordinary gains disclosed by the Treasury report, which showed that the twelve months' period ending January 1, 1929, was the bonanza ers of all times.

IDENTITY CONCEALED

Twenty-four persons reported a total net yearly income of $242,238,796 for 1928, or an average of more than $10,000,000 each. Their identity was carefully guarded behind the blanket classification as "individuals having an income of $5,000,000 or over." There was reason to believe, therefore, that several of them had incomes far in excess of $10,000,000 each. They paid a total tax of $35,000,000, or a little less than $1,500,000 each.

The extraordinary growth of the number of taxpayers in the highest bracket was shown by the fact that during the previous calendar year, which broke all records, there were only eleven persons who reported incomes of $5,000,000 or over.

Tabulation showed that the twenty-four supermillionaires paid practically the same sum in taxes as was paid by the 2,565,297 persons who made returns on incomes of under $5000 each. The total taxes paid by the 2,565,297 persons reporting incomes of less than $5000 were $35,000,243, compared to $36,484,823 paid by the twenty-four.

SUPERMILLIONAIRES

A total of 486 persons had an income of more than $1,000,000 each for the year 1928. In this list were the twenty-four supermillionaires; seventeen persons having an income of $4,000,000 but under $5,000,000; twenty with incomes of more than $3,000,000 but under $4,000,000; eighty-nine with incomes more than $2,000,000 but under $3,000,000; 105 more than $1,500,000, but under $2,000,000, and 241 with incomes of more than $1,000,000 but under $1,500,000.

On the basis of Treasury actuary estimates that any individual having a yearly income of $50,000 not received from salaries or wages is a millionaire, this class of citizens reached its highest peak in 1928. There were 41,818 persons in this bracket.

How the number of persons with annual incomes in excess of $1,000,000 has increased in recent years was shown by Treasury figures. In 1922, there were sixty-seven persons with incomes of more than $1,000,000 annually; in 1923, seventy-four; 1924, seventy-five; in 1925, 207; in 1926, 231; in 1927, 290 and in 1928, 486.

AVERAGE HIGH

The 486 persons with incomes in excess of $1,000,000 each paid a total of $178,525,926 in taxes as compared with the $69,637,000 paid by the 290 persons in the same class in the year previous. The total income of the 486 was $1,072,000,000 or an average of more than $2,000,000 each.

The unprecedented total of the national taxable individual income was shown by the report. Wages and salaries reported in the returns amounted to more than $10,000,000,000, and the aggregate net income of all the individual tax payers was $24,625,488,175.

Notwithstanding the fact that there were fewer tax payers the

COUZENS APPROVES MATCH

Senator's Daughter Explains Elopement as Due to Her Dread of Fashionable Wedding

NORFOLK (Va.) Feb. 2. (Exclusive)—It was not the fear of parental disapproval which caused Miss Margaret Couzens, daughter of Senator and Mrs. James Couzens of Detroit, and heiress to the Couzens millions, to elope Saturday afternoon with William Jeffries Chewning, Washington bank clerk, to be quietly married in Baltimore—it was Mrs. Chewning's aversion to a "big wedding."

"I think big weddings are messy," Mrs. Chewning said this afternoon in their room at the Monticello Hotel, where the couple registered this morning at 8 o'clock after coming to Norfolk aboard a steamer from Baltimore.

"With a big wedding," Mrs. Chewning said," there is always the announcement of the engagement several weeks before the wedding, and friends, through the kindness of their hearts, seem to think that they must at once arrange a series of parties and dances and other things with the result that by the time the date of the wedding arrives you are completely worn out.

"We had planned to be married in March but when he saw that rumors of our engagement were getting into the papers, we decided to get married at once."

With the blessings of her father given over long-distance telephone Mrs. Chewning was radiantly happy.

This afternoon Senator Couzens called his daughter to wish her and her husband happiness and urge that they come back home soon. Senator Couzens has never seen his son-in-law.

Mr. and Mrs. Chewning will return to Washington some time before the 10th inst., the husband stated.

"We've already got our apartment picked out," Mrs. Chewning said.

"And," said the happy groom, "we're going to live on my salary."

"Yes," said the bride. "We'll live on Jeff's salary alone. It's a small apartment and I'm going to do all the housework. I know how, too. Studied domestic science for four years and I can cook everything from bread to eggs."

"Are you going to continue your art studies?" she was asked.

"No," was the reply. "I'll be too busy looking after my husband and keeping house to bother with that any more."

the intercounty citrus departments, were outstanding successes in terms of attendance and subject matter presented.

The investigations to determine the use of water by mature citrus trees were continued in their second year. Plots are under observation at the Ross Shafer and Henry Schmetgen groves at Tustin, and those of Henry Wagner and G. W. Sandilands at Anaheim.

Walnut School Held

J. A. Smiley, chairman of the walnut growers' department, reported that two extension schools for walnut growers were held in February and November, 1929, each comprising four-day sessions of lectures. The annual field day for Orange county walnut growers held in May brought out 255 walnut men to hear recommendations on pest control and view the demonstration of various types of spray rigs. Tentative reports from the various packinghouses indicate that the codling moth control was very satisfactory during the year, where thorough measures were employed according to directions furnished by the Orange county agricultural commissioner's office.

An economic study on the costs involved in changing a walnut orchard to a Valencia planting, just completed, shows that it will require from seventeen to twenty-one years for the returns of Valencias to equal the returns from walnuts, based on the average prices of walnuts and citrus for the past five, ten and eighteen-year periods.

A. J. McFadden, chairman of the persimmon growers' department, said that the 1929 Inter-County Persimmon Growers' Institute and Field Day, held at Anaheim in October, was attended by growers from all sections of Southern California.

The persimmon pruning plots at the McFadden-Walker Ranch are in their third year. The "central leader type," long-pruned trees, show the strongest structure and most satisfactory yields up to the present time.

This past season's persimmon crop of 1550 tons in Southern California met a more receptive market than that of 1928, because of the shortage of other deciduous fruits, such as peaches, pears, apples and plums. Shipments to Canada, England, Hawaii, South America and Australia were made by the Southern California Persimmon Growers' Association, which also waged an educational campaign among consumers to tell them how and when to eat the fruit.

Judge F. D. Halm, La Habra, chairman of the avocado growers' department, reported that the ninth, and youngest, department of the Farm Bureau was organized in November. The only project at the present time is a cost of production study on avocados. Forms have been printed by the agricultural extension service and distributed for the coming year's accumulation of cost data. Three districts are primarily interested in this study—La Habra, Yorba Linda and Tustin.

This will be the first avocado production cost study in California, and promises to furnish a basis of much needed information on the economics of the industry.

Bee Records Kept

R. K. Bishop, chairman of the beekeepers' department, reported that three years of honey cost records have been completed, through which the honey producer can analyse the various cost items that are involved in the honey business, and compare his own expenses with those of other operators, and with the average of the industry. On the basis of last year's prices, it took thirty-five pounds of honey per colony to pay all expenses, including labor, material and overhead charges. The beekeepers' department is active in seasonal meetings and demonstrations.

Poultrymen Busy

W. C. Childers reported that the poultry department, in co-operation with the extension service, had held two automobile tours to study labor-saving devices and methods of management employed on different poultry ranches. Nine demonstration meetings were held, at which poultry management, caponizing, housing, artificial lighting, laying houses, culling and chicken-pox vaccination were featured. Programs were arranged for eleven department meetings. In co-operation with the Los Angeles and San Diego poultry departments, the work of the Accredited Breeders and Hatchery project and of the Record of Performance Association was carried on through the year. The former project had 7044 breeders and 114,000 hatching capacity accredited.

A cost of production study was made on eleven poultry farms, where egg production ranged from 127 to 200 eggs per hen, with an average of 151 eggs per hen for the group. Mortality averaged 16.1 per cent, and 39.4 per cent of the fowls were sold as culls. The average price of market eggs was 29.8 cents, and of hatching eggs, 51.6 cents. Cost of grain averaged $2.47 per hundred and of mash, $2.82, with an average feed cost of $2.68 per hundred. The gross income was $4.93, and the total cost $4.45, leaving a net profit of 48 cents per hen.

"Four Square" Dairying

William Segerstrom, chairman of the dairy department, said that the activities of his department have been built around what might be termed the four legs of the industry, namely, cow-testing, feeding, breeding, and disease control.

Cow-testing has been, possibly, the most actively fostered of these, because it is the basis of all dairy improvement. Cow-testing records show that 872 cows were tested during the year, which averaged 9296 pounds of milk and 382.8 pounds of butter fat. Four herds averaged over 400 pounds of butter fat, and twelve herds averaged over 300 pounds of butter fat.

The high cow produced 12,343 pounds of milk and 612.8 pounds of butter fat in ten months. This cow was owned by A. C. Murdy of Smeltzer. E. A. Wakeham of Garden Grove had the high herd average, 443.2 pounds of butter fat. R. F. Hazard, Midway City, had high herd of over sixty-five cows, with an average of 381.5 pounds of butter fat. A. C. Murdy's herd showed the greatest increase in butter fat, there being an increase of 55.9 pounds of butter fat per cow over the previous year.

The tuberculosis eradication campaign progressed satisfactorily, and more rapidly than was at first expected, until all of the herds have been given one or more tests by the State. Little difficulty has been experienced in getting stock for replacement purposes, but the quality of the stock is not as desirable as that formerly shipped in. Raising of heifers is receiving added attention by the dairymen, as they are beginning to see the desirability of such a procedure.

Grain Recommendations

John Osterman, El Toro, reported for the grain growers. He indicated that the activities of the department have been largely confined to the testing of the adaptability of the different varieties of the main cereals grown in the county, and the conducting of a grain growers' field tour to the plots shortly before harvest. In the selection of heavier yielding strains, considerable success has been experienced. Experimental work has now progressed to the point where certain varieties may be recommended quite definitely.

Among the different varieties of barley, Oregon Club Mariout, or Golden, has been an outstanding high yielder in Orange county. Hero barley has found considerable favor because of its smooth awn and plump, well-filled heads, which will turn off astonishingly good yields per acre, either as hay or grain. It is weaker stemmed than the Mariout, however, and in seasons of heavy rainfall, when extremely heavy growth results, may suffer some lodging. Tennessee Winter has proved a very satisfactory variety in damp ground in this county. It, of course, would not do for hill planting or elsewhere, except under moist conditions.

Kanota oats have been one of the heaviest yielding varieties in the county. Texas Red, commonly grown, is normally two weeks behind Kanota in growth and markedly inferior in hay grain yield.

Escondido and Baart wheats have been the two outstanding varieties. Little acreage is devoted to wheat because of its susceptibility to rust. These two varieties appear to be more resistant in this respect than any so far tested.

Seed Treatment

Growers have accepted the seed treatment program with copper carbonate dust for smut control. In the El Toro and Irvine districts more than 4000 pounds of copper carbonate dust was used in 1929. Effectiveness of the control is observed in the test plots, as well as in the field. Smut heads appeared in each of the five check rows that were untreated and none in the treated rows. One per cent of smut heads was found in the treated fields and 8 per cent in the untreated. While 100 per cent control was not obtained in the treated fields, an infestation of 1 per cent would indicate a satisfactory commercial control.

Sodium nitrate was tried out as a fertilizer for grain, there being eight plots with different rates of application on wheat, and a duplication of these on barley. Records were kept of the harvesting weight, but no appreciable increase in yield was obtained from the fertilizer application. However, but little rain fell after its application, which did not give it a fair chance of affecting the season's yield.

Orange county farm bureau men are tackling "farm relief" from the economy end. Upper left, a water measurement demonstration near Anaheim. Too much water not only costs more, but produces fewer oranges, these demonstrations indicate. Center, a walnut pest control field day, with tower and spray combating codling moth and aphis. Right, a typical Extension Service meeting, where the best and most economical methods are detailed. Lower picture, grain growers at El Toro talking over co-operation in fighting rural fires.

Citrus Fairyland

National Orange Show Gets Ready for Its Opening Day

SAN BERNARDINO.—The National Orange Show which is due to open here February 13 for a ten-day run is assuming the brilliance of the orange shows of the past. The various communities and organizations that are being represented with feature display sections have had workers busy for two weeks, working out the ideas for their feature exhibits. The general motif of the show is "The Land of Make-Believe."

The cultural phases of the show also promise to surpass former orange shows. Growers have been especially interested in the department of citrus education in past years.

Another department that has been considerably enlarged is that of by-products. Visitors from all parts of the world will have the opportunity at the National Orange Show this year to see how the ingenuity of man has been able to make dozens of profitable industries out of those products which were formerly wasted.

The contests for the champion orange grower and lemon grower of the world are attracting much attention again this year, judging from the numerous entries. George C. Roeding of Lindsay and Earnest Mueller of Etiwanda, last year's champions, will have plenty of competition this season.

Twenty or more California high schools will enter teams in the junior judging contest at the show this year, according to the officials in charge. Plans for the contest, which will be held February 22, are virtually complete, it was announced by Max A. Kipf, head of the agricultural department of the San Bernardino High School, who is in charge of the arrangements for this event.

To Portray Farming

Land Show to Mirror Advantages of Life in Country

With the slogan "for the benefit of agriculture" the California Land Show will open its gates March 8 at Hill and Washington streets in downtown Los Angeles and continue sixteen days. It is designed to interest tourists and home seekers as well as "natives" and will present a comprehensive array of the products of California from the Mexican boundary to the Oregon line, all displayed in a gorgeous setting. Excursions will be run from various counties on special days set apart for them.

The land show, a nonprofit event, is being held, its sponsors announce, to awaken interest in farm development, to help stabilize values of farm lands and to educate the public on farm life and the advantages to many in making their living from the soil.

Edwin G. Hart, an extensive landowner of the Southland, is chairman of the committee of arrangements, a committee named by the Los Angeles Realty Board, under whose auspices the exposition is being given. The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce and the California Real Estate Association are actively behind the show.

A Farm Land Convention will be held in connection with the show. Horace Dunbar, director of the California Soil Improvement Committee, has been named leader of the convention by Chairman Hart. Mr. Dunbar, who is engaged in holding program conferences with experts on farm problems, says the aim is to provide a program which will attract and benefit the practical farmer.

The main pavilion tent of the show will be 670 by 130 feet in size. The covering is a heavy blue canvas and will permit of brilliant illumination, day and night. Connecting with the main pavilion will be a lecture hall 80 by 40 feet. There will be a farm machinery demonstration outside.

State's Barley Wins

California grain has been competing successfully with the world. Barley from California was shown in the international exhibition, London, Eng., and the California Farm Bureau Federation, which entered the exhibit, has just received a bronze medal and diploma, the second prize for barley.

This barley was grown from seed received through the Pure Seed Association of California, an organization sponsored by the California Farm Bureau Federation in 1924 which since that time has been working for seed improvement and pure seed protection.

Atlas barley was the type shown in the London show. It is a grain particularly suitable for brewing and malting purposes. For several years this type of grain has been perfected and developed by the Farm Bureau through the Pure Seed Association, and it is now grown extensively and profitably throughout the State.

NEW PEST IS CALLED RHAGOLETIS SUAVIS

By K. L. Wolff

Deputy Agricultural Commissioner, Los Angeles County

AFTER leading both professional and amateur entomologists a merry chase lasting over a period of three years, during which it masqueraded under three different aliases, the walnut husk-fly that made its debut in Southern California walnut growing circles at Chino in 1926, has been "brought to earth" and definitely placed as a hitherto undescribed insect. Now it has a name all its own, and a rather copious one at that, for, in full, it is Rhagoletis suavis, subspecies completa, which means to those that follow scientific names that it is very closely related to the eastern walnut husk-maggot.

The chain of events following the discovery of the fly in which, because of its newness, it was twice wrongly identified before its true status was finally established, is of interest to those who follow the various phases of pest control.

When first found infesting a few trees at Chino, the walnut husk-fly was thought to be the same species that works on black walnuts in the East, because of the nature of the injury it did. Soon afterward attempts were made to carry some of the maggots through to the adult stage so that a positive determination could be made. This rearing out of the adult form of the insect was necessary because the characteristics by which one insect is separated from another are not as definite or as well worked out for the larval forms as for the mature insect. All that the entomologist who did the early work was able to secure, however, was a collection of scavenger insects which usually attack fruit that has already started to decay. As a result, it was believed for several months that the damage was being caused by scavenger flies working on husks which had started to decay primarily from some other cause than insect attack.

Nevertheless, several investigators continued the rearing out of these insects, and in the spring of 1928, some husks that had been placed in a breeding cage the year before, yielded a brightly colored fly that was quickly recognized as something new. Specimens were sent to an entomologist at Washington, D. C., who placed them as the black walnut fly, an insect belonging to the fruit fly family, and which had first been reported from Arizona about ten years ago. As this determination had been secured through a very capable entomologist, it was not questioned, and until the latter part of last summer the local fly was believed to be of the Arizona species.

In August, 1929, A. M. Boyce of the University of California and the writer, representing their respective institutions in a campaign being carried on against the fly in Los Angeles and San Bernardino counties, made a trip to the district where it was first found in Southern Arizona for the purpose of studying the severity of the pest in a region where it had been active for more than a decade. The place visited was in Carr Canyon in the Huachuca mountains, about forty miles west of Bisbee, where a retired scientist, C. R. Biedermann, has successfully grafted several varieties of English walnuts on the native

A deepwell Turbine with a Pedigree

When a rancher buys stock he considers first its pedigree. Good ranchers also investigate the pedigree of the pumps they buy. Byron Jackson deepwell turbines were sired by Necessity out of Experience. Through years of careful selection and improvement there has been evolved the present small diameter deepwell turbine to operate in bored wells. In the light of this background it is not strange that the rancher has found in the Byron Jackson deepwell turbine the answer to his problem—the greatest amount of water for the least ultimate cost.

Works where Others CANNOT Work!

Easy, Accurate Control

"Because of its EASY HANDLING and PERFECT CONTROL, the GRAVELY does all my one-horse work and 75% of what I used to do by hand," writes Thomas Cook, of New Zealand. Similar praise comes from all parts of the world, because of the two outstanding, unmatched features of the GRAVELY: 1. Single-Wheel Traction; 2. Front Tool Hitch. Here is why:

The entire weight of the Gravely is perfectly balanced on the single wheel, giving an easy pivotal action in steering. The tools are out in front where you are naturally looking—you never have to take your eyes off them in steering. This enables you to work within an inch of young plants with absolute accuracy and without the slightest damage. Such close work also eliminates 75% of back-breaking handwork. The front tool hitch likewise pushes branches of spreading plants aside ahead of the traction wheel, preventing damage to such crops.

No other tractor offers you these outstanding advantages. You can work in the narrowest rows, and do more accurate work with much less effort with the GRAVELY. Since 1922 the GRAVELY has been leading the way to bigger and better crops for thousands the world over. Ask any owner. Or write us for proof.
